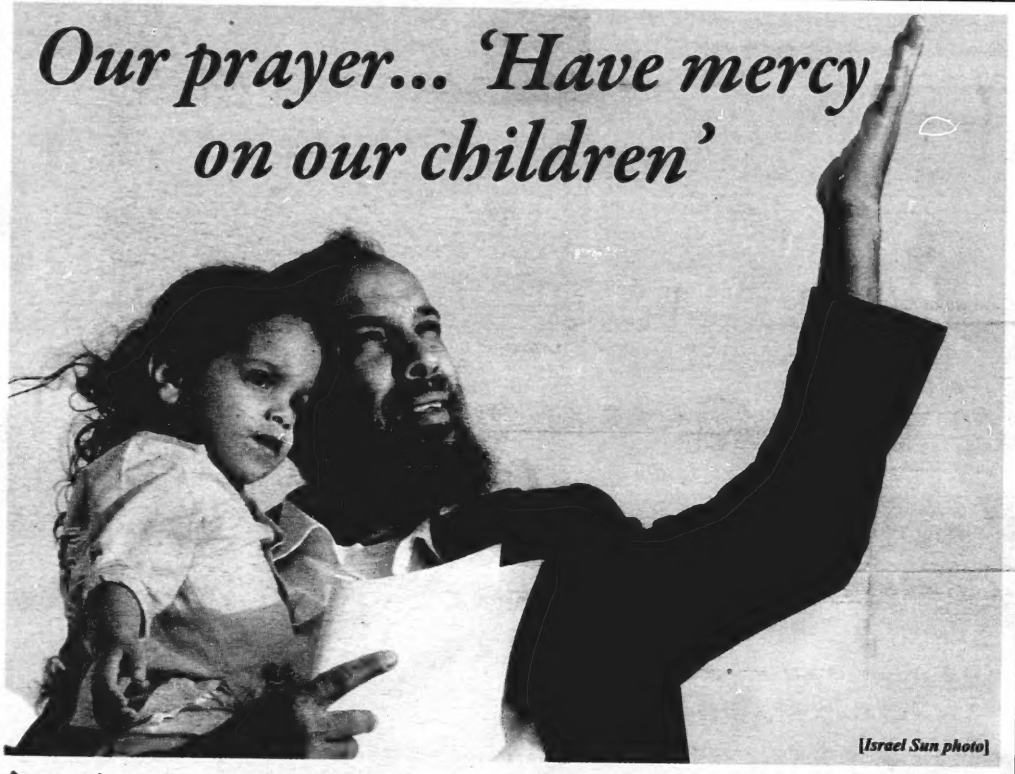
Our prayer... 'Have mercy on our children'



[Israel Sun photo]

The expressions on the faces of both the father and his very young daughter, above, are ethereal. His eyes are to heaven. Her eyes are, too, or at least to a point on the horizon that is farther than her imagination can soar.

His is a look of dreamy wonder. Hers of awakening curiosity.

His arm is stretched emphatically upward punctuating a plea or a paean of praise or perhaps both. Her tiny hand is stretched casually to the side, probably as far as she can extend it, in subconscious replication of her father's reach.

In his other hand, the father holds a sheaf of paper, undoubtedly words of prayer that he has just spoken urgently and fervently for the little girl whom he holds so entirely in his arms, and for others, too.

Editorial

It is a scene so poignant, so evocative, so universal that we sigh.

"May God protect the little children," we cry to ourselves.

"Our Father, our King, have mercy upon us, upon our infants and our young children," we pray together as a community on Rosh Hashanah.

Thoughts for and about our children are a central theme of Rosh Hashanah. Indeed, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks suggests that focus on our children is part of the very theological core of the holiday itself.

"One thing has always struck me about these days: the biblical readings we recite in the synagogue. You would have thought we would read the majestic opening chapter of the Bible... the story of creation," he writes.

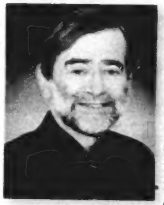
Rosh Hashanah Greetings

'We pray our voice will be sweet and strong'

Isaac Newton is usually credited with having said, "If I have seen further, it is only by standing on the shoulders of giants." In fact, this image, which reminds us that achievement in the future is dependent on solid support from the past, has Jewish roots in the commentaries of the 12th-century Tosaphist Isaiah di Trani.

It is also a very apt thought for Rosh Hashanah, a holiday with deep connections to the theme of memory as the bridge from the past to a proper future. Indeed, the very name "Rosh Hashanah" means literally "head of the year," as if to remind us that the coming year is also perched on the shoulders of what has gone before. Now is the time that we ask God to remember what was good in the past as He decides on our future, to implore, as He turns the Book of Life to a fresh page, that the good in the pages that have gone before will be remembered.



Mark J. Freiman

As 5770 draws to an end and the New Year approaches, with the likelihood of changes to the way in which advocacy is performed on behalf of the Jewish community, I find myself drawn, more than ever to the spirit of Elul, and the importance of history and remembrance; to the importance of legacy.

If Canadian Jewish Congress speaks today with a clear and authoritative voice, we do so because our voice is magnified by the words that have been spoken by CJC since 1919 on behalf of the Jewish community of Canada.

Over our long history, we have learned the importance of speaking softly and, when necessary, raising our voice. We have spoken out against restrictive covenants in Ontario and for civil discourse in Quebec. We have spoken in favour of the rights of the gay and lesbian community to be free from discrimination in Alberta and against systemic discrimination in the workplace, wherever it may be found. We have spoken in favour of Jewish teachers in Quebec, Sikh railroad workers in Ontario and against the anti-Semitism of Doug Collins in British Columbia, Ernst Zundel in Ontario, James Keegstra in Alberta and Malcolm Ross in New Brunswick.

We have pressed successive federal governments to act against Nazi war criminals and enablers in Canada and have, through principled legal interventions, assisted our Rwandan friends who recoiled in horror to discover genocidaires living freely in our country.

We remember the anti-Semitism of Canada's Charlotte Whitton, who worked to deny Jewish children safe haven from the Nazis, and oppose today the notion that she should be granted a place of honour in our country. At the same time, we remain vigilant in regards to 21st-century anti-Semitism, whether provoked by radical Islam or extremes from the left and right.

We remember the how the life of Anne Frank was, along with so many others, cruelly snuffed out, and we are working today to ensure that surviving saplings from her Tree of Life can be brought to Jewish communities in Canada.

Through all this, we have often won and sometimes lost, but we have never given up the fight or our commitment to the principled positions that have guided us for more than 90 years.

Especially at this time, we meditate on the words of the chazzan in Hineni, who prays that he will be as worthy as an "experienced elder" to represent his community. Like the chazzan, we pray that our voice will continue to be sweet – and strong – when necessary.

May we all be inscribed and sealed for a year of happiness, health and prosperity. May we all be deserving of the blessing of peace in Canada, in Israel and throughout the world.

Mark J. Freiman is president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Traffic, subway key priorities for Ward 10 candidates

The CJN* officially begins its 2010 municipal election coverage this week.

The paper will focus on wards in the GTA with the greatest concentration of Jewish households, namely Toronto wards 10, 16 and 21, and Ward 5 in Vaughan.

Throughout September and October leading up to the Oct. 25 vote, we'll offer regular coverage, as well as profiles of the major Toronto mayoralty candidates and their positions on issues of interest and relevance to our readers.

This week's feature is a question-and-answer piece with Ward 10 candidates for Toronto City Council.

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF, RITA POLIAKOV, CARA STERN
Staff Reporters

Ten would-be city councillors are vying to replace retiring incumbent Mike Feldman to represent Ward 10 (York Centre) at City Hall.

The CJN asked each to give their list of priority issues for the ward and what their first official actions would be if elected.

According to the 2006 Canada Census, Ward 10 has the highest representation of Jewish residents in Toronto, with 17.1 per cent of respondents saying they're Jewish.

The ward is bounded in the west by Allen Road and Dufferin Street; in the north by Steeles Avenue; and in the east by portions of Yonge Street, Bathurst Street and the Don River West Branch. Its southern boundary is Highway 401.

The candidates are Joseph Cohen; Jarred Friedman, a city planner; Magda Gondor Berkovits, a businesswoman; Nancy Oomen, former executive assistant to Feldman; James Pasternak, current Toronto District School Board trustee for Ward 5; Eric Plant, an insurance agent; Brian Shifman, executive director of the non-profit Smart Commute; Konstantin Toubis, a realtor; Igor Toutchinski, a journalist; and Edward Zaretsky, a retired engineer.

Cohen, a late addition to the race, did not respond to queries by The CJN's deadline.

The CJN asked each candidate the following question: If elected, what issues will you prioritize as councillor for Ward 10?

Jarred Friedman: My priorities are... making garbage an essential service; providing safer streets for our community by increasing police presence; encouraging neighbourhood watch; improving existing transit services, and making sure money is being spent to support current TTC services rather than throwing it at future services or projects.

I also support sustainable redevelopment at Downsview Park that provides a positive legacy to the community; revitalizing the community through better city and community planning and making our avenues and streets more pedestrian- and bike-friendly and greener.

Establishing community associations would be an essential part of the planning process, and [they] would take more ownership of the development that occurs in our neighbourhood. There's a lack of understanding of the planning process in the community and we need to give more power to our community to have a say in what's being developed.

Magda Gondor Berkovits: There are several platform issues. One of them is linking the subway between Downsview station and Sheppard station. If the subway goes across Sheppard, it will alleviate a lot of the gridlock we have.

If this be a 'scum state'...

From the editor's desk...

Relations between Finland and Israel are on a good footing. Stupid, base, ignorant, offensive remarks by one high-profile Finn will not become the burden of an entire people. A single opinion is not the opinion of all. Israelis are sufficiently sophisticated to understand this.

Nevertheless, a single opinion can still give offence.

Last week, the media in Israel widely reported on an unfortunate statement by Frank Johansson, the head of Amnesty International's Finnish branch.

Johansson made an entry on his blog, which appears on the website of Finland's third-largest newspaper Iltalehti, that was worthy of a stomp in a wet, dirty gutter in a hard, concrete schoolyard. The splashback is of mud.

"A friend of mine who works in Israel was visiting, [and] while piling wood in the shed, we got to [talking about] his favourite topic," Johannson wrote. "[After] several years of residence in the Holy Land, he has come to the conclusion that 'Israel is a scum state.' Based on my own visit[s], which occurred during the 1970s and for the last time in the 1990s, I agree."

In a subsequent interview with the Jerusalem Post, Johannson confirmed that he stood by his statement that Israel is a "scum state."

The fact that Johannson is a high-ranking Amnesty International official is problematic, of course, for the NGO. To the extent that Johannson has any involvement in decisions, statements or pronouncements concerning the Middle East, those pronouncements would have no credibility.

Johansson tried to differentiate his private views from his public persona.

"I am writing those [blogs] in my capacity as a private person, not as an Amnesty official."

But it was a spurious differentiation since he was identified on the newspaper's website by his title: "director of the Finnish branch of Amnesty International."

Asked by the Jerusalem Post what other countries, aside from Israel, he considered to be a "scum state," Johansson named none, but did offer that there are "Russian officials" who meet the criteria.

The real difficulty with Johannson's comment is not the splashback that falls upon Amnesty International. Many people already view the NGO as an unreliable institution stained with radical anti-Israel bias.

It is rather as further proof of the extent to which base ignorance has a hold on the so-called informed classes of many parts of Europe.

The only lens through which Johannson and his fellow ideological travellers see the Jewish state is the distorted lens of the conflict with the Palestinians. He and they seem utterly oblivious to the countless other lenses through which they might occasionally peer that would give them a wider, more accurate view of Israel in the world. For example, let us look through the lens of humanitarian aid. Indeed let us look through the even narrower lens of humanitarian aid extended to Haiti after the monstrously devastating earthquake that struck there in January.

Indeed let us compare the aid and interventions offered by Israel and Finland. Both countries are relatively small, though Finland has about 15 times the land mass of Israel, some 337,030 square kilometres to 22,145 square kilometres respectively. Some 5.3 million people live in Finland; 7.6 million live in Israel.

The most recent information I could find about Finland's aid to Haiti was the figure as of Jan. 20. Finland pledged and gave 1.25 million Euros.

Israel's contribution was of a different kind and of a different order. Among the first countries to offer assistance to Haiti, it sent a 200-strong rescue, relief and medical team. The medical team immediately established a functioning field hospital in a soccer field near the airport. The hospital treated hundreds of patients daily, with pediatric and maternity wards, operating theatres and a pharmacy. The Israeli doctors conducted 319 successful surgeries, and delivered 16 babies including three by caesarean section surgery

In addition, Israel supplied Haiti with some 30 tons of medical equipment, 1,150 blankets, 30 large-sized tents, 500 mattresses, 200 sleeping bags and kitchen equipment.

Israel's rescue and medical effort was widely praised, including by former U.S. president Bill Clinton, who was the UN secretary general's special emissary to the Caribbean disaster zone.

I do not make light of or deny the importance of Finland's response to Haiti's humanitarian disaster. All generosity was needed and welcomed. And I apologize in advance if I have left unreported details of additional aid Finland may have sent Haiti.

I simply point out that if Israel is a "scum" state, then the world needs many more such states whose nationals travel around the globe to help save lives and whose contributions in the realm of humanitarianism are out of all all proportion to the number of its people.

But Frank Johannson might not agree.

Canadians wishing to show their appreciation to the Israel Defence Forces Medical and Rescue Team can do so this autumn in Toronto on Nov. 14 when Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Centre, to which the IDF medical team is attached, will be conferring its 2010 Humanitarian Award of Distinction upon them and upon the Disaster Assistance Relief Team of the Canadian Armed Forces. UJA looks to revitalize entertainment division

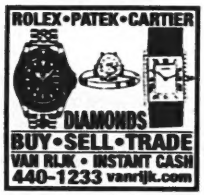
Reaching out to younger generation of Jews in the community

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Berry Meyerowitz, co-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's media and entertainment division, and Elan Divon, a senior campaign consultant at the federation, are reaching out to the younger generation of Jews in the industry and seeing some success in their efforts to revitalize the division.

A reception before this year's UJA campaign launch at the Carlu was its first event in a couple of years, Divon told The CJN in a phone interview. About 50 people attended the reception, and launch keynote Dan Aykroyd put in an appearance too.



Among the challenges the division has faced in remaining active, Divon said he thinks the entertainment business is "a transient business in that people are moving around from job to job. It's a difficult industry to break into and become very successful at a high level."

As well, he added, "There's a lot of travel involved."

He also noted that, because people who work in the entertainment field often become public figures, "a lot of people don't want to affiliate themselves overtly with a particular organization, even if they believe in the cause."

However, Divon pointed out that people in the entertainment industry here have stepped up when necessary. Last year, he noted, Robert Lantos was among those who spoke out when controversy arose over the showing of Israeli films at Toronto International Film Festival. Divon said that UJA wants to "engage" the entertainment community in being pro-active instead of "more reactive."

But Meyerowitz thinks it is more a case of "people [being] concerned about cash flow, and that they have a number of charitable organizations they support. "Our approach is that UJA is an umbrella organization. You're helping so many different areas. Let the professionals at UJA allocate according to whether the funds are going to Israel, to Jewish Family & Child, to day schools, across the board. That's why a lot of us, me included, feel this is a really good charity."

The media and entertainment division is "a very important one, because the potential is so great," said Divon. "We're blessed to have so many talented people in this industry."

Meyerowitz, the 39-year-old president & CEO of Phase 4 Films, has been involved with UJA for more than 15 years, including a stint in New York's young leadership division when he moved there to work in Internet radio. His co-chair is his friend Noah Segal, executive vice-president of Alliance Films.

In 1996, when Meyerowitz started in the entertainment business, he joined UJA's arts and entertainment committee in Toronto. Four years ago, he signed up for more volunteer work, because he "felt we needed more people contributing.

"UJA is about raising funds to help people in need," he said. "Our goal is to bring in a wider array of professionals... and... we want [the younger generation] to know that there's more about UJA than just being asked for money. We're trying to put together a program where there are benefits, and networking, and good opportunities to work with senior executives who have been in the business a while."

Among programs in the works, the division is planning to screen feature films that have not yet been released, said Meyerowitz. Details are still being worked out, as they are for the division's next event, "An Evening with the Stars," to be held Oct. 20.

The division has an active core of more than 20 members, between its canvassers and event committee. More than half of them are under 30, said Meyerowitz.

Dreams and hopes

"But actually we don't. Instead, we read about the birth of the first Jewish child, Isaac, born to Abraham and Sarah after many years of waiting. We read about Hannah and her prayer for a child, which was also answered. I find that deeply moving. On this day of days, we read not about God's act of creation, but about ours; not about the echoing vastness of the universe, 18 billion light years across; but about the joy and responsibility of bringing new life into the world. We don't think of God as the master scientist devising systems of organized complexity, but as a parent, loving and forgiving us, his children.

Typically, Rabbi Sacks has once again led us to a profoundly moving insight.

He could have also added that on the second day of Rosh Hashanah we read of the nurturing and sustaining of the lives of whose births we read on the first day of the holiday.

On the second day of the holiday, we read about the near-sacrifice of Isaac. Then we read Jeremiah's promise to his people that there is a future for us full of hope, that our children will return to their homes.

"The message of Rosh Hashanah is that greater even than an understanding of creation is the ability to hear the cry of a child," he tells us so plainly.

The father in the above photo is holding tightly to his daughter, undoubtedly whispering to her the dreams and hopes that rise every day for her in his heart, the very dreams and hopes his own father once whispered to him.

"Have in front of you the image of a single human child," Rabbi Sacks urges us.

In speaking to his daughter, he is, as all parents know, speaking to the Eternal.

Our prayers to the Eternal on this Rosh Hashanah and forever will always be to sustain our ability "to hear the cry of a child." And respond in Eternal conversation.

Never to forget

Our own prayers to be inscribed in the Book of Life this new year bring us abruptly to the stark realization that Canadian men and women fighting so far away in Afghanistan utter a variation of that very same prayer each day of their service. And for so many, alas, their prayers have been unheeded.

Last week, Cpl. Brian Pinksen died from wounds he received from an improvised explosive device while on foot patrol in Afghanistan. He was the 152nd Canadian soldier to be killed on duty there. May his family and friends find comfort and strength during these very difficult days as they try to reconcile their lives without him.

May his memory be for blessing.

Foreign minister Yitzhak Shamir went to Japan on the first state visit there by an Israeli official of his rank. It was hoped the trip would warm relations with Japan, particularly in the area of trade and commerce, as many Japanese firms – including carmakers Nissan and Toyota – were staying out of the Israeli market for fear of an Arab boycott.

Greetings from the prime minister

I am very pleased to extend my warmest greetings to all Jewish Canadians observing Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

The High Holidays are an occasion for contemplation, forgiveness and encouraging peace in the community. As you reflect on the past year and seek repentance, a spirit of hope for the coming year prevails. Jewish communities around the world share in the optimism and compassion of these ancient New Year's traditions.

Across Canada, Jewish communities are honouring their rich cultural heritage and sharing time with family and friends as the new year commences. Your commitment to preserving your traditions is admirable and contributes to the strength and unity of our country.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a healthy and prosperous new year. L'Shanah Tovah U'Metukah!

Lawyers continue to fight for Pollard

We are the U.S. pro bono lawyers for Jonathan Pollard. We wish to respond to the guest voice by Bert Raphael, titled "Jonathan Pollard, 25 years on" (Aug. 26). Raphael's speculation is misplaced, and his information is flatly incorrect in various respects. While we will not provide a line-by-line rebuttal, suffice it to say that Pollard has consistently expressed remorse for his actions, to U.S. presidents and others. And while Raphael is critical that he was "dismissed," Pollard has been actively represented by the undersigned lawyers since 2000. We continue to fight vigorously for his release.

Torah prohibits homosexual behaviour

Gay-rights advocate David Brody describes himself as both Orthodox and gay ("Orthodox statement on gays welcomed," Toronto; "Rights advocate welcomes Orthodox statement on gays," Montreal, Aug. 26). The Torah in no uncertain terms forbids homosexual behaviour (Leviticus 20:13). The two terms are thus mutually exclusive. Rabbi Adam Scheier of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim is quoted in the article saying that the Shaar has an "unwavering commitment to Jewish law." Why then did the shul allow Brody to speak at the Shaar about being Orthodox and gay, giving others the erroneous impression that they are compatible? For a shul that follows the principles of traditional Judaism, this is a radical break with tradition.

God loves all life

Recent articles have been written regarding people who are attracted to and engaging in sexual behaviours with members of the same sex. I do not for one minute believe that God judges and discriminates against these people. God doesn't behave in that manner. God loves all life. I believe the heterosexual population has problems accepting these people and should just leave them alone and stop making such a fuss. Perhaps it is the heterosexuals who need therapy.

Rabbi Heschel's sermon and Soviet Jewry

The Conservative movement and the Jewish Theological Seminary have been of minimal, if any, help to Soviet Jewry ("The sermon that helped spur the Soviet Jewry movement," Aug. 19). Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel's sermon and what it supposedly achieved pales in comparison to the efforts of other sectors of the Jewish world, such as the Lubavitch movement, which to date has more than 100 Jewish educational centres across Russia, Ukraine, Uzbekistan, Belarus, Azerbaijan, Krygyzstan and the list goes on. To say that Rabbi Heschel "spurred" the movement is an overstatement. The Jewish Theological Seminary to date has no such educational centres in the former Soviet Union, let alone any such Russian-speaking Jewish educational outlets on American soil. If anything at all, the sermon was poetic and emphatic, but it was no catalyst for any Jewish action.

Bikur cholim – a gratifying mitzvah

When I visit my mom, Toby Franken van Lier, at the Apotex Centre in Baycrest I am always impressed and grateful that the Toronto Jewish community has invested its time and money in building and maintaining such a centrally located, world-class facility for our aging parents and grandparents. Every private room has a dedicated team of medical personnel and caregivers close by, and a beautiful showcase usually filled with photos of children and grandchildren. Thus it is a surprise to me that the people in these photos are rarely seen in person. As Rosh Hashanah approaches, may we all be reminded that bikur cholim – visiting the sick and elderly – is one of our most important and gratifying mitzvot.

Don't let the chance for peace slip away, Obama pleads

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

U.S. President Barack Obama urged Israeli and Palestinian leaders last Wednesday not to let the chance for peace slip away as he opened a U.S.-sponsored summit to relaunch direct talks shadowed by Middle East violence.

But in the wake of a second West Bank shooting attack against Israelis in as many days and a persistent deadlock over settlements, Obama acknowledged skepticism "in some quarters" about his prospects for succeeding where so many U.S. leaders have failed, and said he was under no illusions about the challenges ahead.

Wading into hands-on peacemaking on the eve of restarting face-to-face negotiations after a 20-month hiatus, Obama brought both sides together for ceremonial handshakes at the White House and a commitment to try to forge a deal on Palestinian statehood within a year.

"As I told each of them today, this moment of opportunity may not soon come again. They cannot afford to let it slip away," Obama said after one-on-one talks with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Speaking ahead of a working dinner at the White House, Netanyahu said last week that he had come to the Washington peace summit "to figure out a historic compromise" with the Palestinians.

The dinner included Abbas, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, Jordanian King Abdullah II, the Quartet's envoy to the Middle East Tony Blair (the Quartet consists of the United Nations, the United States, the European Union, and Russia), U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Netanyahu.

Netanyahu mentioned the attacks of the previous two days, using them to highlight the importance of Israel's security needs. Netanyahu said that Israel would not allow terrorists to block the path to Middle East peace. Any peace deal, he declared, must be one that guarantees security.

"Peace does not sit well with the idea that you drive down a road and a firing squad guns you down," Netanyahu was quoted as having told Obama during their two-hour meeting.

The prime minister spoke of the need for a "historic compromise."

"The Jewish People are no strangers in our homeland, the land of our forefathers," he said. "But we recognize that another people share this land with us. And I came here today to find a historic compromise that will enable both peoples to live in peace, security and dignity," Netanyahu said.

Addressing Abbas directly, Netanyahu said: "If we work together, we can take advantage of the great benefits afforded by our unique place under the sun. Our geography, history, culture, climate and the talents of our peoples can create unprecedented opportunities in tourism, trade, industry, energy, water and so much more."

Peace "must also be defended against its enemies," Netanyahu said. "We want the skyline of the West Bank to be dominated by apartment towers, not missiles. We want the roads of the West Bank to flow with commerce, not terrorists. We left Lebanon, we got terror. We left Gaza, we got terror. We want to ensure that territory we concede will not be turned into a third Iranian-sponsored terror enclave aimed at the heart of Israel.

"President Abbas, we cannot erase the past," Netanyahu said. "But it is within our power to change the future. Thousands of years ago, on the very hills where Israelis and Palestinians live today, the Jewish prophet Isaiah and the other prophets of my people envisioned a lasting peace for all mankind.

"Let today be a first step, however small, in our joint effort to realize that vision," he said.

Mubarak also addressed the White House ahead of the joint dinner. Speaking in Arabic with a simultaneous translator, Mubarak called on Israel to freeze settlement activity and "seize the opportunity" for peace.

Mubarak said Israeli settlement-building in Palestinian territories is contrary to international law, adding that failure to achieve peace between Israel and the Palestinians has generated great frustration among the populace of the region.

Abbas also addressed the White House, condemning the latest spate of violence against Israelis in the West Bank. He pledged to "spare no effort" to reach a peace agreement with the Israelis.

"We do not want at all that any blood be shed," Abbas said, adding that a comprehensive peace should correct historical injustices.

Abbas reiterated the Palestinian demand for a freeze on all Israeli settlement construction on land the Palestinians seek for a future state, including eastern Jerusalem.

Jordan's king, who also spoke, called on the Israelis and the Palestinians to move quickly to address the most difficult obstacles in achieving a final peace settlement.

King Abdullah warned that the negotiations must produce results.

"Time is not on our side," he said, adding that achieving a deal within the one-year goal would require "sparing no effort in addressing all final status issues."

Obama maintained that final-status issues must be on the table, including establishing borders of a Palestinian state, the Palestinian demands for the right of Arab refugees to return to Israel, and the future of Jerusalem and Israeli settlements.

'We've got a lot of work to do'

The following are excerpts from the text of the joint press conference held by U.S. President Barack Obama and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu following their bilateral meeting on Wednesday Sept. 1, in Washington, D.C.

OBAMA: Hello, everybody. Prime Minister Netanyahu and I just had a very productive discussion about our shared efforts to advance the cause of peace between Israelis and Palestinians and throughout the Middle East. I'm going to have more to say about today's meetings, not only with Prime Minister Netanyahu but with the other participants of the talks here in the Rose Garden later this afternoon. But I did want to specifically take some time out to speak to the people of Israel and to the region about the senseless slaughter that took place near Hebron yesterday.

There are going to be extremists and rejectionists who, rather than seeking peace, are going to be seeking destruction. And the tragedy that we saw yesterday, where people were gunned down on the street by terrorists who are purposely trying to undermine these talks, is an example of what we're up against. But I want everybody to be very clear: The United States is going to be unwavering in its support of Israel's security and we are going to push back against these kinds of terrorist activities.

And so, the message should go out to Hamas and everybody else who is taking credit for these heinous crimes that this is not going to stop us from not only ensuring a secure Israel but also securing a longer-lasting peace in which people throughout the region can take a different course.

I also want to express the deepest condolences of the American people to the families of those who were gunned down. And I want to thank Prime Minister Netanyahu, during a very difficult time for his country, for still being so committed to the cause of peace that he is here with us today.

NETANYAHU: Thank you, Mr. President, for expressing what I think is the sentiment of decent people everywhere, in the face of this savagery and brutality.

Four innocent people were gunned down and seven new orphans were added, by people who have no respect for human life and trample human rights into the dust and butcher everything that they oppose.

I think that the president's statement is an expression of our desire to fight against this terror. And the talks that we had, which were, indeed, open, productive, serious in the quest for peace, also centred around the need to have security arrangements that are able to roll back this kind of terror and other threats to Israel's security. That is a fundamental element, an important foundation, of the peace that we seek and work for.

And I appreciate, Mr. President, your efforts to advance this peace for us and for our neighbours, for our region, and I think we can say, for the world.

OBAMA: Thank you. And let me just say that I will be meeting with [Palestinian Authority] President [Mahmoud] Abbas this afternoon. He condemned this outrageous attack, as well. I have the utmost confidence in him and his belief in a two-state solution in which the people of Israel and the Palestinians are living side by side in peace and security. And so I am also grateful to him for his presence here today.

We've got a lot of work to do. There are going to be those who are going to do everything they can to undermine these talks, but we are going to remain stalwart.

And so, to Prime Minister Netanyahu and to President Abbas, as well as to President [Hosni] Mubarak [of Egypt] and King Abdullah of Jordan, I am very grateful for their participation.

Opinions

A false linkage

Linking Zionism with colonialism – much like accusing Israel of apartheid-like practices – is often central to any discourse that seeks to demonize, dehumanize and delegitimize the Jewish state and those who support it. In the same way that the Israel apartheid slur needs to be deconstructed, so too should the Zionism as colonialism falsehood be addressed.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Writing in the New Republic (Aug. 17, 2010), Dore Gold, president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, comments that it was the association of Israel with colonialist regimes that "set the stage in 1975 for the most insidious resolution ever adopted in the UN General Assembly against Israel, which stated that Zionism was a form of racism."

Even after the resolution was overturned in 1991, Gold notes that that "comparisons between Zionism and colonialism [have] persisted, arguably becoming even more strident."

The notion that Jews colonized Israel (both before and after the Holocaust) is a gross distortion of history. It goes to the very core of a delegitimization argument that portrays the Palestinians as indigenous to the region, with Jews as the "immigrants" or intruders – which deliberately negates the connection of Jews to Israel that goes back to biblical times and has been sustained, in one way or another, ever since.

In embellishing the calumny of the Jew as interloper, Jerusalem's Al-Quds University has an Internet posting that denies the existence of King David, questions whether there was ever an exodus of Israelites from Egypt and claims that Solomon's Temple was really a centre of pagan worship and that the Western Wall was likely just part of a Roman fortress. When referring to the various conquests of Palestine, Egyptians, Hittites, Philistines, Babylonians, Persians, Romans, Muslims, Arabs, Ottomans and British are mentioned, but Jews are not.

Moreover, in 2000, then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat declared that the Temple had never existed, while the Hamas Covenant still proclaims Islamic hegemony over all of what is termed Palestine and draws demonical reference to Jews appropriating Arab lands and challenging Islam.

The inference, of course, is that Jews have no historic rights to their land. But what invariably goes unsaid is that Jews who went to Israel in both ancient and modern times never represented a foreign, colonizing power and therefore, by simple definition, they could not be branded as colonialists.

Also notable is that such immigrants did not take land by force. Instead they purchased it!

In the conclusion to his New Republic piece, Gold laments that "ascertaining the truth has never been the objective of those trying to paint Israel with a colonialist brush." Propagandist historical fiction is, after all, so much more compelling.

Making Israel's Yom Kippur universal

By NACHMAN ROSENBERG

Guest Voice

There's a commonly held belief that one reason Israel's enemies chose Yom Kippur to launch their attack in October 1973 was that most of the country would be in synagogue and it would take longer to call up the reserves.

The reality is that unlike the Diaspora, where this day is one of communal prayer, many secular Israelis stay home on this holiest of days. Data show that the day before Yom Kippur used to have the highest number of movie rentals across Israel of any day of the year.

Contrary to a common misconception, the decision to abstain from participation in High Holiday services is not driven by apathy or secularism. The vast majority of Israeli Jews fast on Yom Kippur and identify with the day's solemnity and themes of repentance and judgment.

A leading reason why they stay home is that they are unable to find a house of worship where they feel comfortable. As hard as it might be to believe that a Jew in the Jewish state can't find a good synagogue in which to daven, this is the reality.

"Traditional" houses of prayer come in every shape and stripe, but if you classify yourself as secular every other day of the year, finding this comfort zone on Yom Kippur can be highly frustrating. Many choose to commemorate the date at home rather than be forced to feel like a fish out of water.

Given that a very large percentage of Israel's Jews are secular, yet strive for some sort of accommodation on Yom Kippur, such a situation is untenable.

In recent years, an organization of rabbis called Tzohar, committed to bridging the ever-widening gap between secular and religious, began to pursue a solution.

While many well-meaning organizations reach out to bring fellows Jews into "traditional" settings, this approach does not relate to the interests of many secular Israeli Jews.

Rather than looking for any awakening or return to traditional practice, on Yom Kippur these already spiritual Jews are only in search of an outlet to convey their individual forms of spirituality.

For this reason, Tzohar has developed a global network of some 200 prayer services in community centres, sports facilities and public spaces designed for Israel's secular majority. With an appreciation for the unique sensibilities of this community, the service gives Israelis a prayer environment where they can feel welcome and in sync with the holiness of the day.

The need for such an institution is evident in the ever-growing numbers of participants we see each year. Founded in 1996, the Tzohar rabbis were unsure whether the secular community would trust anything that even felt like institutional religion, and we were thrilled to quickly earn that trust.

This Yom Kippur, more than 40,000 Israeli Jews will welcome the power of Yom Kippur in these special prayer services. Expressing their Judaism in a forum that is in total context of Jewish tradition but respectful of the parishioners' real emotions, we know it will be a High Holiday they will long remember. Most fundamentally, these services will imbue a heightened love for Judaism and Jewish tradition that will last throughout the year.

As even the most casual observer of Israeli society will tell you, this is a nation with no shortage of inner division and conflict beyond the external challenges that face our beloved homeland. There are no easy solutions to any of these problems. But to even hope to overcome the social divide, we know we must feel the spiritual pains of all sectors of the population.

Throughout our history, Yom Kippur has been a constant reminder of our humility, and that regardless of our differences, we are a united people.

Across Israel this year, thousands more Jews who might otherwise have passed the day in front of their television screens will be reminded of this. And their actions will give hope for a brighter future for our land, our religion and our people.

Will 5771 be the year of pragmatic peace?

After so many failed efforts, there's little enthusiasm in Israel for the Obama round of the never-ending Middle East peace process. The American president's first 18 months of Arab-Israeli diplomacy were characterized by major errors in understanding and judgment, and while the gestures and rhetoric on Israel have improved, the damage remains. And despite the improved atmospherics, Israelis are expecting Washington to increase the pressure on the Netanyahu government as the going gets rough.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The stated objective of reaching a comprehensive and stable agreement – not simply the façade of peace – within a year seems particularly absurd. The catastrophic outcome of the Oslo process reinforced the obstacles that need to be overcome – including vast differences over history, religion, security and territory. Another attempt to paper over differences on Jerusalem and the Palestinian myths of a "right of return" for refugees will only make the situation worse.

And while Palestinian and Arab leaders are going through the motions of peace negotiations, they continue to wage a political war to delegitimize Israel. The campaigns to label Israeli defence against terror as "war crimes," as embodied in the Goldstone report, and to label Jewish national self-determination as "apartheid" are the exact opposite of peace based on mutual acceptance.

Delegitimization and "one state" formulas are simply the latest embodiment of the rejectionism that has continued since Arab leaders rejected the UN Partition Resolution of Nov. 29, 1947, and sought to destroy the Jewish state. If there's any chance for a positive outcome in this latest peace effort, this hypocrisy must end completely.

Given this history, a fairy-tale "happily ever after" comprehensive and permanent peace agreement is not in the cards. But a more modest interim framework that reinforces the current stability and provides some confidence building measures may be possible.

The goal of a limited arrangement, including a proto-Palestinian state, reflects the fact that most Israelis seek some form of compromise. Polls show that the majority want an end to the post-1967 stalemate (the "occupation"), without inviting renewed terrorism, as occurred following the Gaza withdrawal in 2005. Internationally recognized and defensible borders (not the 1949 ceasefire lines) would have a number of positive impacts.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is aware of these realities, as are the majority of Israelis who voted his government into office. In contrast to the hostile media campaigns referring to a "far-right ideology," Netanyahu has become a pragmatic leader.

On the Palestinian side, during the 40 years of the Arafat era, peace negotiations were only a façade, and corruption was rampant. Now, Palestinian society is deeply divided, with Hamas turning Gaza into an Islamist stronghold.

Their bargaining chips are limited, and Palestinians desperately need sustained stability. The relative quiet in the West Bank has created an unprecedented economic boom under Salam Fayad's technocratic leadership. To preserve and extend these gains, and prevent the extension of Hamas' rule, there may now be support for pragmatic compromises with Israel.

In this interim peace scenario, the so-called Arab moderates must start to match their deeds with the words in the moribund Arab League peace initiative. Egypt is on the verge of a difficult transition, as President Hosni Mubarak's health deteriorates and stability on its borders becomes vital. And with the United States leaving Iraq to its own civil wars and a nuclear Iran planning to fill the vacuum, Saudi Arabia and other Sunni powers would also benefit from stability in Israeli-Palestinian relations.

Gaining the visible support of these Arab states, including an end to the anti-Israel hate speech and demonization campaigns, should be the first item on the international agenda. This is also an area in which other countries, including Canada, can play a positive role in the peace process.

Such a step-by-step approach – tackling the difficult issues one at a time, and on the basis of realism, rather than more wishful thinking – may finally yield some positive results.

And on this cautiously optimistic note, as we enter 5771 on the Jewish calendar, I add my best wishes for a healthy, peaceful and prosperous New Year.

The Kirshner File

Reality and fantasy in the Warsaw ghetto

Much of the information we possess today about the Holocaust was, ironically, preserved by the Nazis themselves. Diligent, even obsessive, hoarders, they amassed a mother lode of what would be self-incriminating documents, letters and photographs of the mass atrocities they wantonly committed in the name of a crackpot philosophy, racial purity.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In their attempt to document the systematic murder of the Jewish people, their archenemy, they formed special units, usually composed of uniformed soldiers, to film the bedraggled inhabitants of ghettoes. Convinced that they would win the war and wipe out the Jews of Europe, the overarching objective of the 1942 Wannsee Conference in Berlin, they envisaged this footage as a historic record of a "lost race" in celluloid.

For self-serving reasons, the Nazis manipulated some of the footage, hoping to prove that their treatment of Jews in ghettoes was not so bad after all and thereby mislead international public opinion.

Toward the end of the war, virtually all the propaganda footage in Nazi vaults was inadvertently destroyed by Allied bombing raids. In some cases, historians surmise, the Nazis torched the footage, correctly believing it would not serve their interests.

Despite all their efforts, one of their most notorious propaganda films, the incomplete Das Ghetto, survived the vicissitudes of time.

Shot by a crew in the Warsaw ghetto over a 30-day period in May 1942, just two months before 300,000 of its inhabitants were deported to the Treblinka extermination camp in Poland, Das Ghetto was found mouldering away in a concrete vault in Potsdam Babelsberg, East Germany, in 1954.

It is less than surprising that Das Ghetto, the longest existing documentary about that doomed ghetto, turned up there. Babelsberg, the site of a vast film studio, then and now, was where the celebrated movies The Blue Angel (starring Marlene Dietrich) and Metropolis were filmed.

Babelsberg lent itself to less noble causes, too. Leni Riefenstahl, the darling of Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels, finished Triumph of the Will, a classic film glorifying Nazism and Adolf Hitler, in Babelsberg. Jud Suss, the 1940 anti-Semitic movie loosely based on a 1925 novel written by a Jewish writer and directed by Veit Harlan, was filmed there as well.

Appallingly enough, the raw footage in Das Ghetto, known to archivists, was widely regarded as an authentic account of life in the Warsaw ghetto, which was established in 1940 and liquidated in the aftermath of the revolt three years later. Indeed, clips from Das Ghetto, which had no soundtrack, were inserted into a succession of documentaries on the Holocaust from 1961 onward and were regarded as the unvarnished truth about the Warsaw ghetto.

Its flickering and unsettling images portraying hungry, emaciated Jews and corpses splayed on streets conform to reality. But other images, depicting smiling, beautifully dressed Jews living the good life and well-stocked shops and markets, are extremely problematic, to say the least.

In fact, the staged images were expressly designed to fool viewers and create the impression that conditions in the ghetto were tolerable and that "privileged" Jews could not care less about their less fortunate brothers.

A staged scene of a nightclub in the Warsaw ghetto.

Since Das Ghetto was never completed, we will probably never exactly know what message the Nazis wished to convey. Did they want a film that hewed faithfully to the truth? Or were they solely interested in conveying bald-faced lies?

In 2006, Yael Hersonski, a 31-year-old Israeli freelance film director and editor who had an interest in archival footage from the Holocaust, saw Das Ghetto for the first time at Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem.

"I was shocked by the intensity of the images," she said in an interview.

Little did she know that Das Ghetto, 62 minutes in length, would become the subject of her first movie, A Film Unfinished, which opens in Toronto on Sept. 23 at the new Bell Lightbox.

Premiered at the Hot Docs festival in Toronto this past April and screened at the Jerusalem Film Festival two months ago, A Film Unfinished is 89 minutes long.

It is primarily composed of two elements – raw footage taken both from reels discovered in East Germany in the 1950s and from outtakes originally left on the editing floor that clearly substantiate suspicions that several of the scenes were deliberately faked to distort reality. The outtakes, containing footage of German cameramen accidentally entering each other's frames, was found by a British film researcher.

Yael Hersonski

In addition to footage from Das Ghetto, Hersonski grafted interviews with five ghetto survivors to A Film Unfinished.

The survivors were found by a dogged Israeli researcher Hersonski had hired. "We were extremely fortunate to have such a persistent researcher," she said.

When filming began, Hersonski – a graduate of the Sam Spiegel Film and Television School and a resident of Tel Aviv – invited each of the survivors into a dark hall and showed them the horrifying footage, all the while fearing that they would not be able to stomach the terror conveyed by the images.

"They were over 80 years old, courageous souls in fragile bodies, filled with memories they were compelled to store away in order to keep on living," she writes in a director's statement. "These days of filming the survivors watching the footage were the most difficult ones for me in the course of the entire filmmaking. After every session, I found myself physically numb and mentally knocked out."

Hersonski also reconstructed an interview with the cameraman, Willy Wist, who died in 1999. For years after the war, his identity remained obscured. But in the 1960s, a German historian conducting research in the Polish archives stumbled upon a ghetto entry permit issued in Wist's name in May 1942, the month and year when Das Ghetto was filmed.

After the amalgamation of West Germany and East Germany in 1990, German archivists tried to find Wist, who had been a scrap metal dealer after the war, but to no avail.

Since Wist had long been dead when Hersonski embarked on A Film Unfinished, she hired a German actor to portray him, using transcripts from an interview to which he had consented in 1969. Wist, in the interview, claims he knew nothing about the Holocaust when he set foot in the ghetto.

Asked for an opinion of his explanation, Hersonski replied, "There are things we will never know. I do not judge him."

In making A Film Unfinished, Hersonski had two aims – to expose Nazi manipulation of reality when it suited their needs and to let survivors recall their experiences in the ghetto.

"Soon we won't be able to talk to survivors," she said.

Hersonski's grandmother, who died in 2005, was a survivor of the Warsaw ghetto. But she was close-mouthed about it. "She talked very little about the ghetto. She chose to live rather than to speak."

To this day, Hersonski remains puzzled as to why Das Ghetto was never finished.

"I searched every Nazi archive, but I didn't find an answer. Maybe someone thought it wouldn't serve the needs of Nazi propaganda. Maybe there were technical problems."

It is her hope that A Film Unfinished will teach viewers that skilful propagandists can easily twist reality for nefarious ends.

"Images can be edited and manipulated," she warned, adding that "media systems" can muddy the waters of historical truth.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

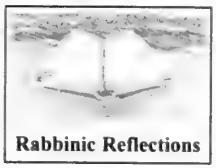
Going beyond ourselves on Rosh Hashanah

By RABBI ZUSHE SILBERSTEIN

When rearranged, the letters of the Hebrew month Tishrei spell out the word reishit, meaning "head of." Similarly, the literal meaning of the name Rosh Hashanah is not "the new year" but "the head of the year."



The head contains all of our prominent sensory powers, including the brain, the seat of our intellect. It's our heads that make us human, distinguishing us from other life forms. But the fundamental aspect of the head is not that it makes us human, but that it opens us up to spirituality that transcends our humanity. The mind enables us to reach an awareness of Godliness that transcends the intellect and indeed, takes us beyond the entire conception of self.

Similarly, Tishrei, "the head of the year," is a month of peak experiences, with prominent holidays that convey important messages regarding our Divine service. The key to all these holidays, however, is not how they enhance and expand our "selves," elevating us intellectually and emotionally, but rather how they empower us to go beyond our minds and our "selves" and relate to God on His terms.

Constraints of space allows us only to discuss Rosh Hashanah, but the same concept applies to all Tishrei holidays.

One Rosh Hashanah, Rabbi Levi Yitzchak, the Holy Berditchever Rebbe, heard a heavenly voice: "If you want to see truly admirable shofar services, visit a little village around Volgograd."

Guided by this heavenly voice, Rabbi Levi Yitzchak's "vision" was directed to an army camp where several Jewish soldiers conscripted into the Russian army had gathered for their Rosh Hashanah "services."

They had no prayer books, nor did they know any of the prayers by heart. They stood in a circle and one of the soldiers stood in the centre with a crudely fashioned shofar and addressed his colleagues: "In synagogues all over the world, Jews are gathered together on this holy day and they raise their voices in prayer. They know that today is a day of judgment and each one prays to God for what he needs and what he wants in the coming year. Every person has his individual concerns that dominate his attention.

"We have no families, nor are we thinking of establishing them. We have no fortunes, and our very lives are subject to the Czar's will. What then do we pray for? That God's glory be revealed throughout the world." He then sounded the shofar and the participants dispersed.

This shofar service was cherished in the heavens, because it focused solely on what God wants and not the wants – be they physical or even spiritual – of the person involved.

Rosh Hashanah marks the anniversary of the sixth day of Creation, the anniversary of the creation of man. Yet Rosh Hashanah is considered the anniversary of the creation of the universe, because it's man who brings the Creation to its ultimate purpose. Through his efforts, he makes it apparent that the world is God's dwelling.

Presently, we are at the culmination of man's 5770-year collective effort. The world recognizes the presence of God in all aspects of our lives and destiny, resulting in the imminent revelation of the Mashiach, as in the words of Maimonides when he describes the messianic era: "For the world will be filled with the knowledge of God as the waters cover the ocean bed."

Shanah Tovah.

What about the new year?

A new year confronts us. What is it that we want from the 12 months that lie ahead?

The first thing we should want is health. This is primary. Health adds zest and savour to our years. With radiant health, we are naturally optimistic – the world lies before us like a land of pleasant dreams. Without health, everything soon turns to ashes in our mouth. All our hopes are blighted, our spirits sag, the universe takes on a more sombre aspect.

But the matter of health, you say, is out of our hands. If anything is beyond our control, this is it. But multitudes of people take the boon of health and throw it away. They drive their bodies relentlessly. They allow themselves no rest. They refuse to learn the secret of moderation. Or they are perfectionists who demand the impossible from themselves and others. Then there are those who give their appetites free rein, who eat, drink, smoke or drug themselves into the grave.

We want health during the next 12 months, but we will only achieve it if we can treat our body as the "temple of the spirit" and are prepared to accept the road of moderation and sensible deprivation.

The second thing we should want in the coming year is economic security. We need to provide for ourselves and our families. We seek recognition for our work, a fair return for our labours. We want enough to educate our children properly and to provide adequately for social and cultural activities. We want to set something aside for our later years. All of this is understandable and desirable. But here, too, there is a necessary resolution: economic security must be a "means to an end," not an end in itself. We must be concerned as much with making a life as we are with making a living. We should pray that what we do gain should not be at the expense of others – or at the expense of our self-respect and most cherished ethical ideals.

We must never worship material possessions, sacrificing health, honour and family to obtain them. When "things are in the saddle," they ride us; they do not belong to us, we belong to them.

The third thing we should desire in the coming year is friendship and kindness. Life can never achieve full meaning or satisfaction unless we experience the warmth, the affection, the appreciation and interest of other people. And we need friends who are sincere, with whom we are not obliged to maintain false social standards, with whom we can find relaxation of mind and spirit.

On the occasion of his 94th birthday, the late writer, historian and philosopher Will Durant was asked what piece of wisdom he would distil from a lifetime of reading and reflection. "If you insist upon one brief answer," he said, "I say kindness."

The person who has not learned kindness remains uneducated no matter how many diplomas adorn his office walls or the number of degrees that follow his signature.

Finally, during the coming year I think we can be most truly alive, and mature if we can achieve a sense of the "mystery" and "wonder" of life. Each of us is a finite creature, our few years, a flash of light between two dark eternities, our being merely a speck on the charts of time. The more we know about ourselves and the world in which we live, the greater becomes the realm of the unknown. This is the verdict of the scientists, no less than the poets. From the smallest atom to worlds of almost unimaginable magnitude, there is so much that lies beyond our human ken.

May 5771 fulfil our deepest longings. May it make real our innermost dreams.

Questions to ponder in shul

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

One of the common assumptions in our culture is that religion, outside of certain fundamentalist trends, is on the decline in contemporary society. Weaned on autonomy and the desire to chart a path unrestricted by ancient codes, the thinking goes, modern people have moved toward secularization and a resistance to religious authority.

It's not that these assertions are without foundation. Bored or indifferent synagogue attendance on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is by now legend. But the trend is complicated, as a study by economists Robert Barro and Joshua Mitchell indicates.

Titled Religious Faith and Economic Growth: What Matters Most – Belief or Belonging? this 2004 paper draws a direct relationship between economic prosperity and declining attendance at houses of worship. This was true whether it was official statistics of church attendance or simply the commitment to religion of individuals.

What to conclude from such data depends on various factors. One could argue that in more developed nations, the rates of literacy and education are higher, health care is more sophisticated and hence the "primitive" need to seek out a deity and be comforted by religious practices is rendered moot.

In contrast with this partly cynical point of view comes the position that economically prosperous nations are wrapped in a shroud of their own arrogance, blindly believing technology and progress will continuously increase the quota of human happiness. This view is perhaps belied by the rise in cosmetic surgery, the dispensing of antidepressant medications and a feeling of ennui in the west.

Western religion has contributed to this alienation by failing to maintain its own standards, while at the same time being closed to the adjustments required to enthuse young people.

This statement is only ostensibly a contradiction. When those who teach Judaism attempt to purvey it as a faith that can be all things for all people, yet cannot even consistently say what it stands for and what the rules are, the irony is that this method rarely persuades those who were unconvinced in the first place.

Yet the opposite ethos, that Judaism need be stuck in the mindset of previous generations simply because they were previous generations, without a serious analysis of why modernity is different, also verges on the irrelevant.

Where does that leave us as another set of High Holidays arrives?

It could be that we have moved past the irrational belief in rationality that marked the 19th and early 20th centuries and its dismissive view of anything outside of scientific empiricism.

People have a dignified need to have faith in something that transcends Twitter and Access Hollywood. Religion will be powerful and permanent as long as it keeps asking important questions, as opposed to quickly supplying formulaic answers.

In shul this year, if only for five minutes, it is worth reviewing what I wanted to be and why, and what path I can lay out to redirect me toward that destiny. Does God play a role in my life? If not, why? If so, how? If a bit, why not more?

Kol Nidre: solemnity and song

It's one of the pivotal moments of the Jewish calendar. Worshippers, many dressed in white, flock to synagogue and wait, often with trepidation, for the cantor to start singing Kol Nidre. But why has a prayer concerned with annulling vows and oaths become so famous? Some insights from the web.

While the concept of annulling vows dates back to the Mishnah, the first references to Kol Nidre are found in the eighth to the 10th centuries. As explained in Jewish Heritage Online Magazine, Babylonian scholars did express discomfort that vows could be annulled retroactively "from the previous Day of Atonement until this Day of Atonement." Although that version took hold, authorities in early medieval Europe amended the text to refer to future vows made "from this Day of Atonement until the next Day of Atonement." Both wordings can be found in modern prayerbooks. [http://bit.ly/nidr01]

Kol Nidre has also generated controversy outside the Jewish community. It doesn't take long to stumble on non-Jewish websites alarmed by the existence of this prayer and what they feel is a licence to lie and deceive. "Explaining Kol Nidre" goes through the prayer line by line and clarifies that it applies exclusively to personal vows made by an individual to God and not between individuals. [http://bit.ly/nidr03]

The memorable melody was first notated in 18th-century Berlin, but it is not known when it was first sung. The Protestant German composer Max Bruch (1838-1920) arranged Kol Nidre into the cello concerto that is familiar today. However, Chazzanut.com points out that Bruch "did not consider his Kol Nidre to be a Jewish composition, but just an artistic arrangement of... a folk tune." [http://bit.ly/nidr05]

Gifted singers have performed this incredible prayer. A search in YouTube will deliver you to versions by Moshe Oysher, Mordechai Ben David, Neil Diamond and, yes, Perry Como. Instrumental performances include one by cellist Jacqueline du Pré. [http://bit.ly/nidr06]

Other versions merit mention, including the classic by Al Jolson [http://bit.ly/nidr07] and a performance by the magnificent Cantor Yossele Rosenblatt. [http://bit.ly/nidr08] (On that page is a New York Times story about the man who made it his mission to restore Rosenblatt's recordings.)

Bruch doesn't have a monopoly on Kol Nidre. Jerusalem's Jewish National And University Library presents other melodies recorded in Jerusalem, Italy and Morocco. The site also showcases a version performed by Nathan Adler and the choir at Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in the early 1950s. [http://bit.ly/nidr12] Nicolas Jolliet offers a reggae version using sitar, surbahar, tabla, oud and dumbek. [http://bit.ly/nidr10]

In 1944, Judy Weissenberg was 15 years old and a prisoner with 800 other women at the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp. On Yom Kippur, some of the older women asked permission to do something to mark Kol Nidre. They received a candle, a siddur and 10 minutes to pray. [http://bit.ly/nidr11]

But instead of praying, the women burst into tears. "I never heard either before or since then such a heart-rending sound. Even though no one really believed the prayer would change our situation, that God would suddenly intervene – we weren't that naive – but the opportunity to cry and remember together helped us feel better. It reminded us of our former, normal lives; alleviated our utter misery, even for a littlest while, in some inexplicable way… That is the Kol Nidre I always remember."

There's something about Judaism

By ELLEN WEISER

Guest Voice

It seems that it has all been written or said before. In these times, it appears that now more than ever, we are being blamed for everything from holes in the ozone layer to the winter without an end.

Certainly, all bad tidings are our fault, which is why we have been blessed with a sufficient supply of guilt to allow us to handle it all. It is because of this kind of thinking that the central idea of a Jewish connection comes into play.

Sept. 10, 2001. The date bears no significance to the tragic events that followed the next day. It was on the 10th that I was confronted with my first experience of blatant, as opposed to subtle, anti-Semitism.

I was on my way into my son's junior high school to pick him up, when two students approached me outside, gazed at my Magen David and proclaimed, "Look at the fking Jew."

My first response was shock, followed by tears of both anger and sadness. My son knew immediately by my face that something was wrong. I told him what happened, and his reaction was to find those responsible and confront them. I was about halfway back to my car when I decided that I had to inform the vice-principal. Unfortunately, I wasn't able to give him enough information to find and punish these perpetrators.

However, the event struck a strong chord within me. I am probably the least religious person, but I knew my sense of Judaism was alive and well when I could react so strongly to such ignorance. I knew that if my faith meant little or nothing to me, my response would have been virtually non-existent. This gave rise to my thinking about a Jewish connection and how our faith seems to be such a binding force.

Several years ago, the great comedians Mel Brooks and Carl Reiner created a character known as the 2,000-year-old man. Played so perfectly by Brooks, he was interviewed by Reiner about numerous topics. One question posed to him was, "Who in your opinion is the greatest inventor?" His reply, "Jewish or anybody?," implying that if the individual were not Jewish, his/her accomplishments, if any, would be deemed to be less than noteworthy.

The Jewish connection is omnipresent, revealing itself in so many ways.

When watching a television game show, do you do your utmost to establish if any of the contestants are Jewish? Do you find yourself cheering for them simply on the basis of their religion?

If a tragedy occurs, such as the murder or accidental death of someone in the community, is the gravity of this event augmented because the victim is Jewish?

Do you play "Jewish geography" at a simchah? Upon introducing yourself to your fellow guests, do you ask a question beginning with, "Are you related to…" or "Do you know…?" When Sandy Koufax refused to pitch a crucial World Series game on Yom Kippur, you could almost hear the entire Jewish community cheering in unison.

How does one account for this connection within our faith? Certainly, a sense of comfort and security would offer a partial explanation. To paraphrase a classic Jackie Mason-ism, it's most unlikely that while walking down a dark, deserted road, we would quicken our pace, thinking, "Oh my God! I'm being followed by an accountant!" This imaginary scenario illustrates the feeling of security that we experience when with our own.

When looking for our dream home, we tend to think in terms of a "Jewish area." Other issues involved with such a major purchase, including proximity to schools, shopping, transportation, etc., seem to take a secondary role. There is always that bond, whether we acknowledge it whole-heartedly or reluctantly resign ourselves to its existence.

Although we may argue and disagree among ourselves about religious practice within our various denominations, we are all Jews. The backbone of our faith is the connection, something to grasp, regardless of whether we keep Shabbat, attend services regularly or maintain separate meat and dairy cutlery, dishes and cookware.

These rituals are all important, and their significance should not be dismissed. Whether we perform them or to what degree should not detract from the Jewish connection. If one chooses to use regular coffee on Pesach instead of purchasing coffee marked "Kosher L'Pesach," is such a person any less a Jew?

If we are one mitzvah short of performing the 613 required, do we shake our heads in despair and dismiss everything, much the way one would after weeks of dieting, only to yield to temptation and polish off that carton of Baskin Robbins ice cream?

We must not get hung up on petty issues, whether we follow our faith to the letter or see the inside of a shul only three days out of the year… or not at all. There are too many whose happiness is dependent on our despondency. The Jewish connection – it is what we are, who we are and what our children will be. Let us preserve it with all the reverence it deserves.

UNFORTUNATELY, HATE IS VERY TECH SAVVY.

Our ancestors endured unimaginable hardships. Stood bravely in the face of thousands of years of ignorance and hate. We have survived it all, but hatred has also survived, and it has found a comfortable new home. The Internet.

Hatred online challenges Jewish identity and demands Israel's demise. That's why UJA Federation has created Activism Net.

We're training high school and university students to use online tools for positive purposes – to strengthen Jewish identity and build life-long connections with Israel.

We need your help. Together we can keep the Jewish People proud and strong.

Candidates vie to replace Feldman

It would loop the subway so you could go from Union all the way around in a loop, so that would be good for everyone in Toronto.

It certainly would benefit Ward 10, where I live, but the spinoff would help everyone.

The other [priority] is Downsview Park. It should be kept as a park for our children and our grandchildren, for generations to come.

Nancy Oomen: From what people have told me, they want to see clean parks, they want to see park improvements, they want to see roads that are not filled with potholes, they want to have efficient snow removal, reliable transit, and they want to keep the community safe. Those are things that I've heard from residents from all of my years working in the ward.

I've been working… on the accessible water play and sensory garden that's coming to Earl Bales Park. I've been doing all the work with staff and the donors and the consultants to try to get it on track because we really want to open it here. So hopefully that's going to happen.

I'd like to continue working with seniors and all the different communities because it is a very multicultural ward. I want [Ward 10] to continue to be the place where they can go to help get issues resolved.

James Pasternak: We need to change the temperament at City Hall. Many constituents feel there's an erosion of trust and we need to make sure they feel a part of the process again.

Ratepayers and taxpayers are at the tipping point. I've seen many seniors losing their homes and young families unable to move [to Ward 10] because of the tax base. Taxation is out of control.

Our [transit] system is 30 years out of date. It's crucial we have a spending envelope for subway-only expansion. I would support expansion of the Sheppard subway to Downsview station.

The current plan to renovate Wilmington Plaza is unworkable. I would not support it and I would vigorously oppose closing the off-ramps to Allen Road.

I'm also deeply concerned about the anti-Israel groups hijacking public events. I'm the only one of the candidates who has held elected office [as a TDSB trustee] and the ward needs a voice … the Jewish community needs a voice at City Hall.

Eric Plant: That's a good question, but the more important [question is] how will I get things done? It's OK to set up a wish list, but my plan is to go around and ask people what needs to be done. I want to institute town hall meetings. There's a failure to see the potential in Toronto. My top priorities would be service, transit… a lot of people want the Sheppard [subway] line extended to Downsview station. I'm creating a list of what needs to be done by going door-to-door. Once elected, I'll go through the list. Things like tree-clipping, grass cutting, potholes… all these little things, we can't fix them unless we know what they are.

In terms of bigger items, the Wilmington Plaza [proposed renovation] is something I want to get involved in and I want to hold a meeting about the city's plan to get rid of the Allen Road on/off ramps from Wilson Heights Boulevard. I don't like the way the city is going about this, and I'll make it more transparent once I'm elected.

Brian Shifman: I want to work on transportation. The city needs an expanded subway network. It's important for a city this size to have a master transportation plan. We need to look at the infrastructure and maximize efficiency.

I want to close the loop on the subway line, but not across Sheppard Avenue. I would leave the decision on how best to do this with expert planners.

Ward 10 is largest Jewish riding in Toronto

The ward also needs more community engagement. I'd like to hold quarterly, rotating town hall meetings throughout the ward and expand knowledge on projects for the neighbourhood.

[Toronto] also needs a funding change. We need to upload services that properly belong to the provincial government, like social services. And I'd look at getting a larger share of the gas tax from the province.

I also don't think it makes sense to close the [Allen Road] ramps. That's part of the city's Downsview secondary plan, though it hasn't yet been approved.

I also want to push to remove the private vehicle tax.

Konstantin Toubis: We need... to upgrade the TTC system. [It] needs new buses and more buses. We have lots of residents in the City of Toronto… we only have a few subway lines. We need to build more.

It was a good idea to charge 5 cents for plastic bags – people would think to take five bags or 10 bags – but my question is, where is this money going? [The government] recommends that stores spend the money on green programs, but do you have an idea where this money goes? [I would] build a special fund and use that money for programs for the environment. Let's be honest: Ward 10 is not the safest ward in the city of Toronto. One of the issues is [youth crime]… We need more police officers on the road, patrolling. We need to see these guys in the ward.

I don't want to see children on the street, doing nothing. We need a youth council. This committee has to be for all youth. We need to understand all youth and create programs, especially in our ward, where we have lots of low-income families.

Igor Toutchinski: My first priority is the traffic delays. In my opinion, we can improve our traffic if we eliminate some unnecessary bus stops to avoid traffic jams. We need, as soon as possible, synchronization of green traffic lights to avoid bus delays and traffic jams. Another thing is our TTC. Sometimes our TTC buses come to a stop three at a time. Sometimes people wait 30 to 40 minutes for the bus. We have to adjust the bus schedule in our area. I propose to make, once a year, a Bathurst Village Festival [to encourage multiculturalism.] We can close Finch Avenue to Sheppard Avenue. We have lots of businesses around… people can try the food of these restaurants, we can put a stage in the centre and bring stars from Russia, Israel, the Philippines.

Edward Zaretsky: I've lived [in Ward 10] for 55 years. My priorities [include] improved wheel transit and more benches on the streets for seniors to rest on. We also need to set up organized activities for children and we need bike lanes. We have one on Bathurst Street, but no one knows about it.

There's so much that has to be done to get kids off the street [and] let kids go into an area that's secure to learn to play sports or have seminars. Kids get out of school and there's nobody home for them. Parents don't know where these kids are. They're running wild in the streets. I can get someone to teach music after school, maybe to explain baseball or football. It's not hard to do if you have a vision.

Ministers promote trade, peace in Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

International Trade Minister Peter Van Loan and Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), both filled their schedules with Israel-related tasks last week.

Peter Kent

On Aug. 31, Kent began a nine-day trip to Israel to "launch Canada-Israel discussions on the Americas," he said in a statement. He added that Canada also wanted to look at "shared objectives in the region" on the issues of "security, democracy and prosperity."

His working visit included talks with Israeli President Shimon Peres, Foreign Affairs Minister Avigdor Lieberman and Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs Daniel Ayalon.

Peter Van Loan

He was also scheduled to tour various sites in the country, including the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology and Yad Vashem.

Additionally, Kent had scheduled a visit to the West Bank, where he was to meet with Riyad al-Malki, the Palestinian Authority's minister of foreign affairs, to discuss how to implement a five-year, $300 million "package of assistance" to the Palestinian Authority that is intended to focus "on support in the areas of security and justice."

Canada first announced this funding in December 2007 at the Paris Donors Conference.

Kent was scheduled to return Sept. 8.

Meanwhile, in Toronto last Thursday, Van Loan held a working luncheon talk for the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC) to highlight ongoing trade agreements between the two countries and announce that he will travel to Israel.

Van Loan said he was proud of Canada's 61-year political relationship with Israel.

He noted that since the 1996 signing of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement, bilateral trade between the two countries has grown to $1.3 billion.

"But our success goes far beyond trading goods back and forth," Van Loan said, noting that Canadian businesses such as Research In Motion, Air Canada and Super-Pharm have built a "strong commercial presence" in Israel over the years and that Israeli corporations such as Teva Pharmaceutical Industries and Amdocs have similarly "made inroads" here.

Asked what Canada is looking for trade-wise from Israel in the future, Van Loan said the government is "betting" on the strength of the country's science and technology sectors for continued return on investments.

"We're also working on taking our science and technology partnership to a new level in the years ahead," he said.

"When it comes to collaboration between innovation and technology, Canada and Israel have led the way," he said.

Van Loan also noted that earlier this year, prime ministers Stephen Harper and Benjamin Netanyahu agreed to "take yet another important step" in Canada-Israel trade by establishing a bilateral innovation conference.

He said that project is "currently in development."

Speaking about his upcoming trip to Israel, he told The CJN that it would have a "strong focus" on the science and technology sector, but unlike Kent, he has "no plans" to meet with anyone in the PA to discuss Canadian-Palestinian trade opportunities.

Israeli professor builds 'self-thinking' robots

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

If Daniel Weihs wanted to take over the world in a supervillain coup, he probably could.

Weihs, an aerospace engineer and professor at Technion – Israel Institute of Technology autonomous systems program, is involved in building robots. Autonomous robots.

"An autonomous system is a system that... has to think, it has to decide on its own. It's the generalization for the concept of a robot," said Weihs, who spoke at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place at an event hosted by JUMP, Birthright Alumni Community and The House, on Aug. 26.

"[Autonomous systems] can take the place of humans in dull, dirty, difficult and dangerous jobs," he said, explaining that these robots can be used in factory assembly lines or air traffic control centres.

"A human controller can't control more than 20 [airplanes] at one time. Robots can do many more."

Weihs' lecture, titled "Batteries Not Included: Exploring Israel's Technological and Military Advancements," focused on Technion University, which was founded in 1924 and currently has 9,000 undergraduate and 4,000 graduate students. The school's projects include building a satellite that was launched into space, creating unmanned airplanes, scooters, tanks and underwater vehicles and building the Snake, an autonomous, "self-thinking" robot with a camera attached to it that's currently being used by the Israel Defence Forces.

"Its purpose is to go into cracks in collapsed buildings. There's a camera in its face, if it sees a body, it can measure its temperature," Weihs said, adding that, if the body is warm, crews can be sent in to rescue it.

During his speech, Weihs explained the components of an autonomous robot. These systems have sensors, which act as its eyes and ears; decision making and assessment tools, which act as their brains, communication tools, actuators or limbs, and the payload, or the transporting system.

These robots, according to Weihs, have different levels of independence. At the lowest level, the systems are fully programmable and supervised, at the highest they're able to make decisions in groups without supervision or programming which can cause problems, Weihs said.

"If an unmanned vehicle shot at people it thought were Taliban, and they took off their uniforms and became innocent bystanders, they go to... court. Who do you charge? The operator? [The vehicle] made its own decision. There's an issue here. You can lose control. You need to make sure the decisions that are made are humane," he said.

During the event, Weihs also described Technion University's medical projects, which include tiny robots that can be attached to the body of a patient during an operation and control the amount of movement from the scalpel.

Professor Daniel Weihs of Technion University spoke about autonomous robots at the Jewish Urban Meeting Place.

"It measures the involuntary tremors of the surgeon and the motions of the patient. It analyzes the motions and deducts from the motion of the scalpel," he said.

Technion is also working on creating robotic surgeons, as well as micro-robots that could swim through the body and deposit medicine in the appropriate area.

Weihs ended his talk with a newer project at Technion. Rather than create robots, experts are trying to control animals and insects, such as locusts, by attaching electrons to their brain.

"As of last week, our locusts can move right, left, forwards and backwards. The next step is to attach a camera to the locusts," he said.

Shira Webber, the director of joint programs at JUMP, sees Weihs' speech as an important reminder of Israel's technological contributions.

"It's easy to get bogged down by the negativity that surrounds Israel," she said. "This is really just to show [Israel's] advances in science and technology... [it] highlights Israel in a positive way."

Municipal Vote 2010

Moscoe says goodbye to Ward 15, politics

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Howard Moscoe's reign in Toronto Ward 15, Eglinton-Lawrence is no more.

After three decades in municipal politics on North York and Toronto city councils, the veteran politician is stepping down.

His announcement last Monday came as a surprise, as he had left his name on the list of candidates for the Oct. 25 municipal election.

Speaking to The CJN last week from Iqaluit, Nunavut, where he was attending board meetings of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, Moscoe, 70, said he has no regrets about retiring at this juncture.

"I've been on the job for 31 years. It's time to move on," he said, adding that he's now looking forward to spending more time travelling and being with his family.

Asked about his future plans, he would only say that he has "some interesting offers" on the table.

His retirement comes after another longtime councillor, Ward 10, York Centre's Mike Feldman, 82, announced in July that he's also calling it quits.

Moscoe's departure from the race leaves five remaining candidates – Josh Colle, Rob Davis, Giussepe Pede, William Reitsma and Ron Singer – vying for his seat on council. He said he's endorsing Colle, son of Eglinton-Lawrence Liberal MPP Mike Colle.

Moscoe said he's happy to have left many projects "with a solid foundation" on the go in his ward for his successor to complete.

One of them is the controversial re-vitalization of Lawrence Heights. He said "replacing this area with a mixed-income community" is essential.

"The planners made a lot of mistakes in the 1930s and 1940s when they thought that simply buying new housing for low-income people was the solution to all their problems. This was false. [Residents] were disadvantaged more by being gathered in ghettos."

The proposed redevelopment of the public housing section of the neighbourhood has angered some local residents, many of whom are afraid of increased traffic congestion and poor city planning to properly integrate the nearby Allen Road artery.

Moscoe, who is Jewish, said he's also proud that one of his last acts on council was successfully passing a motion in council two weeks ago to create a museum celebrating "Jewish immigration at the turn of the century."

Howard Moscoe

There's a "forgotten" Jewish history of Toronto that needs to be remembered, he said.

The museum will be housed in City Hall when it's completed in about three years, he added.

"I'm proud to be leaving this as my legacy," he said.

Moscoe, whose grandmother came to the city in 1912, noted that much of Toronto's Jewish immigrant population originally settled in an area called "The Ward," located between University Avenue on the west side and Trawley Street (now Bay Street) to the east, and between Queen Street to the south and College Street on the north end.

"It was a Jewish immigrant slum, much like that of New York's Lower East Side, in the shadow of City Hall. And in fact, New [Toronto] City Hall was built on top of it," as was hospital row on University, he said.

Moscoe admitted to having mixed feelings about leaving council.

"I love my job. It's exciting, but the memories are bittersweet. But I think I'll be remembered most for the little things that affected people's lives," such as pushing through a bylaw to put an end to the city's apartment buildings charging for visitor parking, he said.

Another was his motion to force retail stores to allow public access to restrooms.

"My reputation has been as a fighter. In politics you can sit back and get re-elected, or you can do things and rub people the wrong way and make enemies. My 31 years have been controversial, but I can now sit back and say to my grandchildren that I did some things, and here's what I did," he said.

Moscoe said that he wants voters in his ward to "look for the candidate that is intelligent and cares about people."

Regarding the city's mayoral race, Moscoe said "it's anybody's guess" as to who will win, although he's backing Coun. Joe Pantalone, because "he understands the art of compromise."

Asked whether he ruled out a return to politics down the road, Moscoe said it's "the furthest thing" from his mind.

Greater Toronto Area

Stepping up to the plate for Israeli kids

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

The third annual Pitch for Israel baseball tournament swung into action on Aug. 22 at the Powerade Centre in Brampton, Ont., and on Aug. 29 at Camp Robin Hood in Markham.

More than $425,000 was raised for vulnerable children in Israel through One Family Fund Canada. The tournament was sponsored by Scotiabank, JUMP (Jewish Urban Meeting Place), Cineplex Entertainment, Fabricland, Magen Boys Entertainment and others, said Daniel Warner, the event's founder and organizer.

"One Family Fund Canada is an incredible Jewish organization that directly supports Israeli [families] whose lives have been devastated by terrorism," Warner said. "They are a valued tournament partner."

Warner said that meeting some of the children at One Family Fund's bowling night when they were here before the tournament was a highlight of his summer.

Kortney Shapiro, left, and Marissa Daniels were volunteer co-ordinators at the Scotiabank Pitch For Israel baseball tournament.

"Our committee was invited to interact with the beneficiaries of the money that we have been working so hard to raise. Their energy shone through in spite of the hardships they have endured. These bereaved children need our support, and [working with] One Family Fund was the best way to help them."

Over 400 players, participants and volunteers attended the tournament, which was five times the size of the first Pitch for Israel in 2008. With an overwhelming response from the Jewish community, Warner said there were 30 teams at the Pitch for Israel in Toronto in addition to 12 teams in London, Ont., and 12 in Detroit.

"The Pitch is quickly growing up," Warner said. "We want to find Jewish leaders in different cities who are interested in joining us in expanding the Pitch to new heights."

The Detroit tournament was created last August when Benjy Gordon and Adam Blanck of Michigan decided to run the event in their hometown. They have successfully raised over $25,000 for Detroit- and Israel-based Jewish causes this year, Warner said.

The London tournament was a natural fit for expansion, as Warner has been very involved with the University of Western Ontario's Jewish community through AEPi, Hillel and Chabad. He said the Pitch For Israel has now become the title sponsor of the largest Western student softball league.

For the first time since the tournament's launch in Toronto, Warner welcomed Canadian politicians including MPs Peter Kent and Ruby Dhalla, and MPPs Glen Murray and Monte Kwinter to the Powerade Centre.

Kent and Dhalla presented the awards to the top fundraisers, Warner said.

Warner's idea for the tournament was born after he participated in a Birthright Israel trip in the early 2000s. His madriach stressed the importance of "giving back to the Jewish community," which made Warner step up to the plate. "I realized that if I combined softball, Jews and an important Jewish cause, we would have a homerun on our hands," he said.

"I enjoy getting involved in worthwhile projects that unite our community and engage the younger generation to make an impact."

Over the past decade, Warner has been linked to many organizations including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Reena Foundation and the Canadian Cancer Society. He has received recognition for his community service from UJA and Dhalla's office, and was nominated by Jewish Federations of North America as a Jewish Community Hero in 2009.

He has received the Righteous Hand Jewish Campus Life Award and was a finalist for international president of the year for the AEPi Jewish fraternity. Most recently, he founded The Tribe – a philanthropic network that focuses on expanding the social scene for Toronto's young Jewish professionals through events, speaking engagements, travel and nightlife.

"But my main objective is to help those in need in our community here and in Israel, while aiming to inspire others to get involved, and give back in their own way," he said.

"It's important for Jews to realize that we are all players on the same team, especially in light of recent developments. We need to stand together, united," Warner said. "The players and volunteers are the ones that have made the Pitch For Israel what it is today, and the community support from various Jewish organizations and sponsors is uplifting."

YORK PRESIDENT RENEWS EXCHANGE AGREEMENT WITH HEBREW UNIVERSITY

On a recent trade mission to Israel with the Premier of Ontario, Mamdouh Shoukri, President & Vice-Chancellor of York University, renewed the exchange agreement between York and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. Continuing a longstanding tradition of encouraging York students to study at Israeli universities, while also hosting Israeli students on our campus, the renewed agreement facilitates student and faculty exchanges, and the development of new York-Hebrew University partnership projects. The renewed agreement builds upon a forty-year relationship between the two universities, and complements York's existing exchange programs with other Israeli academic institutions.

INNOVATIVE PROGRAMS AND AN INTERNATIONAL REPUTATION FOR EXCELLENCE

The dynamic Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education, Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future, has garnered international acclaim. Developed by Professors Michael Brown and Mark Webber, and established in partnership with York's Centre for German and European Studies, the program brings together Canadian, German and Polish education students to study – in order to teach about – the Holocaust and racism.

York's Jewish Teacher Education Program prepares students for careers in Jewish education, awarding degrees earned in both the Faculty of Education and the Faculty of Liberal Arts & Professional Studies.

The York University Visiting Professorship in Israel Studies brings an Israeli professor to our campus to teach, conduct research, and give public lectures. We thank the generosity of our friends in the community, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and York's Faculty of Liberal Arts and Professional Studies.

NEW AND NOTEWORTHY: CENTRE FACULTY AS LEADERS IN RESEARCH AND KNOWLEDGE

Two new milestone publications by Centre members are Jewish People, Yiddish Nation: Noah Prylucki and the Folkists in Poland by Kalman (Keith) Weiser, the Silber Family Professor of Modern Jewish Studies, and Kerem: Creative Explorations in Judaism, edited by Centre Director Sara R. Horowitz and Gilah Langner. Forthcoming in December, Jewish People, Yiddish Nation explores the rise and fall of Yiddishism, a major cultural movement that shaped Jewish collective identity in the twentieth century. Kerem is an annual publication featuring contemporary Jewish thought, literature, commentary and ritual.

משפט השבוע

ביה בית המשפר של בוסטס עיאמדן מדגדה מאשם של מג"ב, והוא ישבצה על כך בהחלטה של בית המשפט. וכך אמר האב: " אני לא יכול להאשים ילד בן שמונה עשרה שיורה בילדה בת עשר".

הזמנתי להרצאות בסיאול דרום קוריאה על ידי מתמחה שלי שחזר למולדתי. הבטחתי בינם שבת הרצאות ותכננו לימים ראשון. מה גדולה היתה הדהמתי לגלות שיום ראשון הפסירים הנהא היה יום העצמאות של דרום קוריאה. השבתי לעצמי שלא בעבדה, לא בארה"ב ובוודאי לא בישראל- יתקיים כעס ישראי בינם העצמאות. לא יעלה על דעתו של איש לבלות בשבדה ולא להניח עם המשפחה. לא סתם אני שותה את רשמי המסע בקטע הזה, כי הוא מגלם את מה שקורה שם- האנשים האלה שבדים כמו גמלים. אפילו יהודי מהימבים, התרבות לא מאפרות לבא-דרום קוריאה הוא גם כלכלי. הם, יחד וסין שמים את המערב בבים הקטן. הבר האמריי הוא בבי בשתי מרגה.

Theatre gala to honour 'unsung hero'

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

He stood up for Israel, and now the Harold Green Jewish Theatre will be standing for him.

This October, the theatre will be honouring Ucal Powell, the executive secretary treasurer of the Carpenters' Union in Central Ontario. Powell, who immigrated to Canada from Jamaica in 1969 and joined the Carpenters' Union in 1970, is a friend of the Jewish community, supporting both Israel and the local diaspora.

In 2008, when the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) called for a boycott of Israeli academic institutions, Powell and the Carpenters' Union put forth a resolution supporting Israel and peace in the Middle East at their 2008 Canada Conference.

"There has been a great deal of misinformation circulated about Israel by some misguided Canadian labour organizations. The Carpenters' Union felt very strongly that the record had to be corrected," said Powell in an e-mail interview about the resolution.

"I can assure your readers that the Carpenters' Union will continue to stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the State of Israel and Canada's Jewish community for many years to come."

Aside from publicly supporting Israel, Powell has also supported causes including the State of Israel Bonds and the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

But this isn't exactly common knowledge, said Cary Green, who helped found the theatre.

"I would describe Ucal as one of the great unsung' heroes in the Jewish community," said Green. "When you do a gala, you look for someone to honour...Here was an opportunity for me, as a friend...to have him highlighted.

"I want the Jewish community to recognize its friends, and Ucal is certainly one of the greats among them."

Ucal Powell

The gala itself, which will raise money and awareness for the theatre, will be held on Oct. 7 and will feature Louise Pitre, a Tony nominated actress and singer, as well as musical guests Beyond the Pale.

Avery Saltzman and David Eisner, the theatre's artistic directors, are taking a two-pronged approach with the gala, which will include dinner along with the entertainment.

"Our guests are coming because they're fond supporters of Ucal Powell or are friends of the Harold Green family and supporters of the company," said Saltzman.

Eisner agreed.

"It's kind of a neat trick. Not only do they honour someone that's never been honoured, they get to support a Jewish theatre company."

For Powell, the theatre is a worthy cause.

"[The theatre] is an organization that is mandated to celebrate and share Jewish culture through the creative arts. In addition, this theatre company helps to foster tolerance by providing audiences of all cultures and backgrounds with a better understanding of the dynamic nature of Jewish culture," Powell said.

"We are blessed to live in a country that celebrates diversity as a core value and fundamental element of our national identity. And I know that we will continue to cherish our diversity as long as organizations like the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company continue to thrive."

The gala, which is co-produced by the Canadian Council of Carpenters, will take place at the Paramount Conference and Event Venue on 222 Rowntree Dairy Rd. in Woodbridge. Cocktails will be served at 6 p.m. and dinner starts at 7 p.m. For tickets or more information, visit www.hgjewishtheatre.com.

A HIGH HOLIDAY REQUEST FROM IRVING LEVINE AND LIONEL ROBINS

Dear Community Members,

As Honourary Chairs of Jewish Family & Child's 2010 Friends Campaign, we know the programs and services this vital organization offers are simply indispensable. For this very reason, our families have made a capital gift to UJA Federation in order to further the work of JF&CS in the community. We have invested in the future of Jewish social services in Toronto and we urge you to do the same.

WHEN YOU SUPPORT JF&CS YOU SUPPORT WELLBEING including counselling, chaplaincy, hospice programming and support for children with special needs. JF&CS also runs homework clubs, an adolescent mental health centre and places social workers in schools across the GTA.

WHEN YOU SUPPORT JF&CS YOU SUPPORT SUSTAINABILITY including financial assistance to the most vulnerable members of the Jewish community, such as Toronto's growing Holocaust survivor population, and helps send kids to Jewish day and overnight camps. JF&CS operates the Out & Beyond Shop and sustains partnerships to provide vocational rehabilitation.

WHEN YOU SUPPORT JF&CS YOU SUPPORT SAFETY [illegible] Aid Society for our community and to provincially mandated services ensure each [illegible] and emergency assistance to the growing number of abused women and [illegible].

The strength of Toronto's Jewish community relies on the support and care we show each other. Newmarket shul moves into larger building

Or Hadash Synagogue gets a new home

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Members of Or Hadash Synagogue held their High Holiday services at a golf course last year. This year, they'll be held at home.

Or Hadash, a Reform synagogue in Newmarket, Ont., has moved into a larger building, located in the heart of downtown Newmarket. The temple's last location, on Leslie Street, held about 100 to 115 people, which, during events and High Holidays, was too small for the growing congregation.

"This will give us more room to grow," said Larry Raifman, the synagogue's president, adding that the new building, located at 451 Botsford St. will hold around 140 to 150 people.

"It's a really good location for us. It's in downtown Newmarket, near a public library. Parking's really good in the area," he said, explaining that the synagogue will use two of the building's three floors.

In the past, the synagogue, which currently has around 40 to 50 member families, held Shabbat services at Southlake Village, a long-term care facility, and High Holiday services at Glenway Country Club.

"To be able to hold simchahs as well as High Holiday services in one location, I think it gives more of a feeling of community," Raifman said.

Funds are raised for the new home through initiatives such as a charity golf tournament.

Apart from holiday services, the new home, which was celebrated with a dedication service on Sept. 5, will also accommodate the congregation's Hebrew school and will cater to the synagogue's growing, diverse membership.

Or Hadash, which has been around since the early 1990s, serves the northern part of York Region, as well as some congregants from Richmond Hill and Thornhill. Members come from Aurora, Newmarket, Innisfil and Keswick.

"We have everything from families with young children, newlyweds, interfaith couples, single parents with kids, a whole range," said Raifman. "I think [the new location] gives members a reaffirmation that we're alive and looking to grow and serve them in the future."

Rabbi Jonathan Crane, who works part-time at Or Hadash and leads High Holiday services, sees the move as an important opportunity for the synagogue.

"To have sufficient space [for] services and programming and education, it really means to have a footprint, not only in Newmarket, but also in Ontario and Canada," he said. "Now [members] will be able to worship in the place they call home."

For Bonnie Mark, who has been a member of Or Hadash with her family for around eight years, location is an important factor in choosing a synagogue. But community is more important.

"It's very much a community-based synagogue. It's a little different from a synagogue in the city. We don't have people coming for morning services throughout the week, it's more about the Hebrew school, the youth, High Holidays, that kind of thing," she said.

"We're very relaxed, very welcoming… Originally, I would have said [that I stayed a member] because of the location, but the location could only last so long. If you don't feel comfortable, you go in your car and go to the city."

Toronto academic aids U.S. health care bill

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As commutes go, it's a pretty formidable one. With the working week approaching, Sherry Glied leaves her home in New York City and hops on a plane to Washington, D.C. After five days of putting in very long hours, she reverses direction and heads back to the Big Apple to spend the weekend with her husband and two young children.

It's quite a grind, but for a health-care economist, being at the centre of the health-care universe in Washington is a dream come true.

Sherry Glied

Glied, 49, is living the dream as assistant secretary for planning and evaluation in the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. As such, she serves as principal advisor to Kathleen Sebelius, secretary of health and human services, who is implementing "Obamacare," the U.S. government's ambitious health-care agenda.

In her capacity as a senior administrator, Glied heads a 110-person team. "We provide policy analysis, evaluate existing programs, and staff teams to figure out how to implement health policy," she said on the phone from Muskoka in northern Ontario.

Glied was visiting family during a summer respite from her busy schedule. The daughter of Monika and Bill Glied of Toronto, she attended Bialik Hebrew Day School briefly before enrolling in Associated Hebrew Schools. After high school, she earned a degree in economics at Yale University, studied law at the University of Toronto and then earned a PhD at Harvard as a health economist.

A career academic whose research has focused on the financing of health-care services in the United States, Glied advanced from her job as assistant professor at Columbia University to a full professorship in health policy and management and then as chair of the department.

"I got a great job at Columbia, to my mother's eternal chagrin. I married an American and I'm stuck," she said.

A dual citizen, Glied served as a senior economist for health-care and labour market policy to the President's Council of Economic Advisers under presidents George H.W. Bush and Bill Clinton.

While still on leave from university, she worked with then-first lady Hillary Clinton in trying to re-make American health care.

"I was always interested in social policy and how you can make people better off," Glied said. That included "lots of statistical research and data analysis."

An Obama political appointee, before taking office she appeared before a Senate committee to be questioned by lawmakers. She was confirmed on June 22 and took office shortly after that.

"I've always been a big proponent of universal health insurance," she said, noting that this is something the current plan envisions.

"The Obama policy is not particularly a government one," she said. "It wants to make sure everybody has coverage."

Implementing the health-care bill of more than 2,000 pages is a monumental task, and though it doesn't take full effect until 2014, some of it is already operational. One such provision allows children to stay covered under their parents' health-care insurance until they turn 26, she said.

The health-care plan has proven fairly unpopular in the United States – RealClearPolitics' late August average of polling data shows 52 per cent oppose it versus 39 per cent in favour – with critics pointing to, among other issues, the provision that allows adults to still be covered by their parents' insurance.

Glied acknowledges that there is opposition to the plan and that "some people are concerned the government is taking too big a role and that quality will diminish and they are afraid that they will pay more to take care of other people."

But, she said, "I think it is perfectly possible for the system to work effectively [to extend] coverage and not cost a lot more money. The way the system works now is that there is universal coverage for those 65 and over [in Medicare]. The new people coming in are not terribly sick. On average, they don't cost that much to cover."

Glied said the United States spends much more on health care than other countries, "with not much better outcomes."

"By being more efficient with existing programs for those 65 and older," you can find cost savings, she said.

So, does the Canadian experience in providing universal health care influence her views?

"I'm neither a proponent or a critic of the Canadian health system. I believe, consistent with Jewish values, that people should have access to health care.

"Virtually all other countries have universal health insurance, except the United States. No two systems are the same."

Though only on the job for a couple of months, Glied feels she's hit the jackpot. "It's very exciting. It's a wonderful opportunity for someone who's devoted their life to this to make a difference. It's not often in public life you get a chance to do something important. It's a widespread feeling in the office," she said.

In 5070 Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish and Humanitarian & Relief Committee, continued its Tikun Olam work in Canada and around the world with your support of our programs and events. With your support we were able to:

- Distribute 15,000 Kinder Kits to underprivileged children in Canada, Israel, Poland, Haiti, Kenya, and Zimbabwe to relieve one financial obstacle to a child battling poverty;
- Expand our outreach services to the homeless populations by having vans on the street five days a week and serving over 5,000 people in the past year;
- Launch a children's breakfast program that serves over 700 students coming from low-income families in the downtown core, thereby increasing a child's ability to concentrate and better learn in school;
- Facilitate 3 volunteer projects providing medical care and public health education in Guyana, and complete the provision of over $1,000,000 of aid to our partners in Zimbabwe;
- Create a Haiti Earthquake Relief Fund that raised $240,000 for orphans and other survivors and supported the Israel Trauma team;
- Run the first Ve'ahavta Street Academy that delivered an 8-week course on Transitioning off the Street to the homeless. All 10 of our students graduated the program;
- Spoke in over 30 synagogue and schools of all Jewish denominations on Tikun Olam and Chesed (Kindness).

Kinder Kits distributed by March of the Living participants to Polish students, April 2010

During the Jewish year of 5771, we remain committed to:

- Increasing the number of people served through our Mobile Jewish Response to the Homeless outreach project by directly serving shelters with our volunteer van shifts in 2011 as well as serving people on the street;
- Sending 30,000 Kinder Kits to Jewish and non-Jewish communities throughout the world – Canada, Israel (10,000 kits), Poland, Kenya, former Soviet Union, Guyana, Zimbabwe and Haiti;
- Enhancing our long-term efforts in Israel by sending volunteer teams to help out in soup kitchens, trauma centres and distribution centres for our Kinder Kit program;
- Expanding our Ve'ahavta Street Academy to operate year-round;
- Sending two medical and public health education teams to Guyana, to serve communities in the rainforest.

Shul-bombing evidence OK, judge rules

Compiled by CJN staff

A Superior Court judge last week turned down a defence request that he throw out handwriting evidence that allegedly links Ottawa university professor Hassan Diab to a 1980 attack on a Paris synagogue.

Justice Robert Maranger rejected arguments from Diab's lawyers that French authorities who are seeking Diab's extradition abused Canadian court processes by providing "tainted" expert evidence that kept the legal process going even though the evidence is flawed.

Maranger ruled there's no evidence of an absence of "due diligence" by France and that rejecting the evidence is "disconnected" from the alleged abuse.

Although French authorities had withdrawn two initial handwriting reports and replaced them with another, the defence contended the evidence should be withheld because of "mischief" in the case.

Federal lawyers have said the handwriting evidence is crucial. Experts have identified Diab's signature on a hotel registration card and prosecutors allege that person was responsible for the synagogue attack.

The terror plot on Oct. 3, 1980, Simchat Torah eve, killed three French male pedestrians and an Israeli woman and injured 40 others. The bomb was hidden in the saddlebags of a parked motorcycle that exploded outside the Rue Copernic Synagogue as hundreds of worshippers gathered for services.

According to prosecutors, Diab is accused of having driven the motorcycle that exploded.

Diab, who was arrested two years ago and was released on condition he wear an electronic monitoring device, claims he's the victim of mistaken identity. He says his name is common in his native Lebanon.

Defence lawyer Donald Bayne said last week he would ask for a stay of proceedings when the extradition hearing resumes on Nov. 8, based on the "misconduct of France" and a failure in diligence and accuracy by French officials.

McGill U to honour Richler

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — McGill University is raising funds to create the Mordecai Richler Writer-in-Residence Program, which aims to "inspire a new generation of writers" and honour one of Montreal's most famous authors.

Richler never attended McGill nor did he graduate from any university, but he was awarded an honorary doctorate of literature from McGill in 2000. He died in July 2001.

The bilingual program is to be located in both the department of English and the département de la langue et littérature françaises in the faculty of arts. Its mandate, however, isn't limited to nurturing novelists.

The program will offer students "an enriching opportunity to study practical and theoretical approaches to writing for such media as television, film, radio, stage, interactive media and print publications."

Richler, who raised a ruckus with his caustic essays on Quebec's language laws, might have found it amusing that he would be memorialized through a program that will also seek to "enhance [the literary translation] program's visibility in the French-speaking cultural community both in Canada and abroad."

McGill hopes to annually attract accomplished Canadian writers from "diverse stylistic and linguistic traditions."

Two writers will be selected each year, who will be paid $37,500 each. They'll be required to teach one course, give public lectures and readings, organize writing workshops, and advise undergraduate and graduate students, with enough time left over to write.

The program, as envisioned, would also provide bursaries to graduate students totaling $40,000 each year, and launch a literary journal.

McGill hopes to raise $2.5 million for the program, and has received $750,000 to date, including a $100,000 donation from Richler's widow, Florence.

That McGill would choose to pay this posthumous tribute is not without irony. Richler chided McGill for its pretentiousness, and when he accepted the honorary degree, he spoke of its quota system for admitting Jews until the late 1940s.

"Housing this position at McGill, in a city where writers from diverse cultural backgrounds flourish, will offer students and academics a unique opportunity to explore the wealth of Canada's distinct literary worlds and celebrate the richness of this diversity," said arts dean Christopher Manfredi.

On Sept. 21, McGill is organizing a "Literary Pub Crawl" to commemorate Richler in a spirit of bonhomie and encourage contributions to the writer-in-residence program.

Recent political changes suggest Washington talks could surprise

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The period leading up to the Netanyahu-Abbas summit in Washington, D.C., starting on Sept. 2, was marked by a surprising discrepancy in tone and content between most news reports, on the one hand, and much commentary on the other.

In general, news items reflected a widespread scepticism that anything positive would or could emerge from the summit. The attitude was that this meeting would be much ado about little, except perhaps to hand U.S. President Barack Obama the appearance of a foreign policy gain in advance of this fall's U.S. Congressional elections where members of his Democratic party are expected to do badly.

Illustrative of a growing tendency in the news to blur the line between fact and opinion, a Reuters report, carried in several Canadian papers on Aug. 30, captured the reigning scepticism with a play on a famous saying by media guru Marshall McLuhan: "It is unclear what, if anything, may come out of [the] talks or whether the meeting itself is the message."

Another theme that dominated much of the reporting was the centrality of Israeli settlements to the very viability of the talks, as if nothing else was at issue.

This focus achieved an outrageous emphasis when the New York Times, in a story also carried in the Sept. 1 Globe and Mail, reported in the opening paragraph that four Israelis, including a pregnant woman, murdered the day before in the West Bank, "underscored the disruptive role that the issue of Jewish settlements could play in the already fragile negotiations."

This judgment was presented as an objective fact. It was not until two paragraphs later that readers hear the "Israeli" view that Hamas, which claimed responsibility for the attack, "seemed" determined to thwart negotiations "which it virulently opposes." The failure of the Times to see Hamas' violent opposition to peace – and to a Israel inside any borders – as the salient, objective fact in this tragic affair speaks volumes.

To be sure, there were a few exceptions on the news side to the sheer scepticism about the talks and to the fixation on settlements. For instance, in his Aug. 31 Winnipeg Free Press story, Samuel Segev drew attention to how the Washington talks fit into what he views as Obama's developing strategy for the Middle East. Segev wrote, "Despite the low expectations in Israel and among the Palestinians [over the Washington meeting], there nevertheless are some new elements that did not exist in the past: An Arab 'cover' to any concessions that Abbas could make; and, more importantly, an American readiness to offer 'bridging proposals' in case of a stalemate."

But given the reigning negativity on the news side, it was all the more surprising to find a positive outlook for the Washington summit in several prominent commentary pieces – including Martin Indyk (in the New York Times and reprinted in the National Post) and Aluf Benn in the Aug. 28 Globe and Mail ("It's too early to write off direct talks"). Benn, editor-at-large of Ha'aretz, argued that the low expectations for the talks actually work to the summit's advantage, as does the fact that recent changes "in the political environment" (consistent with what Segev described) "give peace a better chance" now. In particular, Benn noted that in order to gain Obama's co-operation in dealing with a nuclear Iran, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has had to pay a price, which Benn calls "a Natanz-for-settlements tradeoff."

In a significant departure from conventional wisdom, Benn wrote: "The international media portray Mr. Netanyahu's government as 'hard line,' but examining its actions shows a different picture. The current Israeli government is the most dovish since Yitzhak Rabin's assassination 15 years ago. Mr. Netanyahu has been reluctant to use military force and has slowed settlement growth. Security and economic co-operation with Mr. Abbas' Palestinian Authority is as strong as ever, while Palestinian Prime Minister Salam Fayyad is making progress in his bottom-up state-building progress."

Benn is far from being naive or overly sanguine. He acknowledges the "serious obstacles," including in Abbas' camp, that stand in the way of success. Still, he has indicated another side of what is typically presented in one-dimensional form, with all the onus for progress placed on Israel and no expectations made of the Palestinians.

Sole Power and Magen Boys join forces for the Showtime Event Expo

In business we often refer to cliché thoughts such as "my slice of the pie", "going for the gold", or "trying to be number one". Business owners are always trying to achieve maximum growth and distance their companies from their competitors. The business of "parties", "entertainment", and DJs" is no different. In fact, it is often more competitive as the big players attempt to distinguish themselves from the pack. That is what makes SHOWTIME so interesting.

For the first time ever, the two largest entertainment forces in Toronto have teamed up for a greater cause. Magen Boys Entertainment owners, Page and Jian Magen, along with Sole Power Productions owner, Abby Tobias, are working together to create "the best trade show this city has ever seen". Gloria Benaim, owner of G Consulting, is the group's third partner and the event's lead coordinator.

While Gloria oversees the day-to-day operations of the event show, Page, Jian, and Abby oversee all the production aspects. Production? I asked the same question. "We want the show to look and feel like an actual party", explains Page Magen. "We want attendees to be able to visualize what an event can look like". "This show is meant to accomplish several goals" says Jian Magen. "We saw that there was a void in the trade show market, so we wanted to create a forum in which we showcase the city's best service providers, truly catering to the needs of Toronto's clientele". The organizers of SHOWTIME promise to do just that as well as introducing many new, unique and unseen exhibitors to clients.

"We are in a unique position based on our background as entertainment company owners, venue owners, and performers. We speak to clients every day, and have a good understanding of their wants and needs" says Abby Tobias. "SHOWTIME will be an event dedicated to providing those things to our attendees". Keep in mind that Sole Power and Magen Boys work with over 1500 events annually combined. No one else in this city can gather input from a base that size and use it to facilitate a trade show and expo like this. Abby also noted that Gloria is not only an Event Planner who often works with Judy Stein Consulting, but also runs a successful venue (Factory Lounge) and has kids of her own for whom she plans parties. "Gloria always offers a unique perspective about what clients are looking for, based on her personal experience".

This group has been creating memories at the city's best parties for the past 10 years. Although competitors, the Magen brothers and Abby have always maintained a close friendship that has finally lead to the birth of SHOWTIME. "We expect to offer one expo event in 2010, and another two to three in 2011" says Gloria. "We have so much to offer and want to give our clients lots of choice. It's important they make informed decisions when planning their upcoming events".

October 6th, 2010 is the date, and Beth Torah Synagogue is the location. SHOWTIME will host close to 100 exhibitors, and the group anticipates over 500 attendees. It's nice to see a group of young people who aren't trying to "have their cake and eat it too, but rather make the cake, dress it up, and then share it with everyone!" I'm excited to drop by Beth Torah on October 6 and have a slice...it's SHOWTIME!

Aviva and Noam Schalit in New York with city mayor Michael Bloomberg

Meeting Aviva and Noam Schalit

By SAMMY KATZ
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

I arrived in Jerusalem recently with colleagues from the Canadian Network for Israel Affairs. We decided that the first thing we had to do in Israel, before any of our meetings, before visiting friends and family, and even before visiting the Western Wall, was to visit Aviva and Noam Schalit, parents of kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit, at their protest tent outside Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's residence in Jerusalem.

The night before our meeting, I lay awake, tossing and turning. All I could think about was, "What if my son or brother was Schalit? Would I have been able to stay strong and cope for four years as the Schalits have?"

Walking toward the tent, I saw sheets draped over the fence of the prime minister's residence. The sheets were covered with thousands of signatures from people who want Schalit to return home. The pictures of Schalit as a child remind you that he could have been your brother, son, grandson, cousin or nephew.

When we walked into the tent, Schalit's parents were sitting alone. The look on their faces was one of four years of exhaustion. When I shook Noam's hand, I was at a loss of words. For months I had planned what I would say if I ever had the chance to meet with the Schalit family. The night before I knew exactly what I would say, but when we met, I realized that I couldn't say anything to bring them relief.

What would an apology for their suffering do? I couldn't possibly say that I understand the pain they are going through. Nearly none of us can. I broke the silence by talking about their other son, Yoel, and how we were excited to meet him.

Draped over a chair in the tent, I saw Gilad's favourite T-shirt, with the words "Reserved for Gilad" printed on it. It was at this point that I almost burst into tears. I decided to stay strong, as the last thing I wanted was the Schalits' comforting me. It was the exact opposite reason for why we visited them.

When we left their tent, I realized that the Schalits have been sitting the world's longest shivah. For more than four years, their son has been in terrorist captivity, and the only time they have "seen" him is in an extremely short video clip released by the terrorists holding him, in which he looks frail.

As Aviva, Noam, Yoel and all those who support them "celebrated" Gilad's 24th birthday this past Aug. 28, all of Am Yisrael must take a moment to reflect; what if he was your son or brother?

Let us all pray with the Schalits when we celebrate Rosh Hashanah and let us pray that Gilad returns home soon and safely.

After all, we are all the Schalits' family.

Dealing with scars of terrorism

By MASADA SIEGEL
Special to The CJN

Several things run through your mind at the end of a great adventure seeking beauty in the world, especially when you have quit your job, run out of money and aren't certain where in the world you are headed next. But, a philosophical discussion on the meaning of life with a perfect stranger, no less, certainly is not one of them.

Grant, a member of an elite Australian special forces team was in line behind me at the Sydney airport, when he started talking to me. It was August 2004, and I was returning home after three months of wandering around Australia and New Zealand. He was heading to Wales.

Guest Voice

"Everything happens for a reason," Grant's voice echoed in my head.

"How can you be so sure?" I asked.

"I know it. I've seen it every day of my life, and it's just how the world works," he said confidently.

"How can you believe it?" I wondered. "How do know that things happen for a reason? Maybe things happen and we give them reason, and not the other way round."

A million thoughts swirled in my head, especially Sept. 11.

I vividly remember that day, as I was working for CNN on the Lou Dobbs show Moneyline, as a field producer. I had just started and was excited, as financial news was perfect for me, generally low drama.

I distinctly remember a conversation with my father in late Aug. 2001. I said, "I can do this. The markets go up and down, there is no blood and guts in these news stories."

Weeks later, Sept. 11 happened right in front of my eyes. Writing about it today still brings me to tears.

In disbelief, I watched smoke pour out of the enormous gash in one of the World Trade Center buildings. Soon after, the building started to fall. As I watched my brain was screaming, "There are people in that building and you are watching them die and there is nothing you can do." I had never felt such anguish and helplessness.

"Where were you on Sept. 11?" I asked Grant.

"I'll never forget Sept. 11," he said. "My mother died in my arms at the hospital and then my brother and I heard the news."

I couldn't help but think, as I was watching the world falling apart, his world was also falling to pieces thousands of miles away. Soon after, Grant was sent to fight the war in Afghanistan.

I covered the story for two years and my usual happy sunny disposition disappeared. Covering funerals and sad stories daily took its toll. I needed a change and wanted to focus on the good in the world. I read books by the Dalai Lama and every positive person out there I could find. But the book that made the most sense to me was the Australia and New Zealand guidebook. So I did the math, dug into my savings account and booked myself a flight.

In my quest to find a new perspective on life, I climbed glaciers, went whitewater rafting, hiked mountains and was talked into skydiving in New Zealand with my new friend Dave Ellis.

Dave and I bonded immediately after jumping out of a perfectly good airplane 12,000 ft. above the ground. So when he invited me to spend time with him and his girlfriend in Australia, I accepted. I had no plans for this adventure and wanted to see where the world would take me.

One evening in Perth we had dinner with Dave's warm and loving family. His British grandmother, Bette Ellis, told me she met her husband in Jerusalem in 1946. Leonard was in the British military, and they traveled the world together. She was an adventurous lady filled with energy and as a youngster was an avid dancer.

Mesmerized, I listened. On Feb. 28,1967, her world was changed forever. She was severely injured in a terrorist bomb attack in Aden, Yemen. The bomb exploded during a cocktail party. The two women talking to Bette were killed. Her injuries were severe and she was left as a paraplegic: paralysed from the waist down.

The incident shattered the Ellis family. Her youngest son, David, was sent to England to be looked after by Bette's sister. Her husband, Leonard suffered from extreme guilt because he had left Bette at the party as he was called away to work. They eventually divorced and she was left a single parent to three children. Leonard went on to have three nervous breakdowns and died at age 62, from cancer.

In my search for beauty in the world, I had come face-to-face with terrorism more than 40 years later, and saw the effects it had on a family. Once again my heart was ripped to shreds over how one act, one moment in time, can shatter a person and a family forever.

The story stuck with me and I recently emailed Dave's father, Alex, to interview him.

"Thanks for the interest in Mum's story," he wrote. "Yes, the impacts may go on for years and in many cases are difficult to cope with, whereas the public interest tends to be more about the event and the immediate impacts. In many ways, there are almost forgotten victims of such attacks. Mum was a very strong person and led a very active life considering the extent of her injuries. Her story is certainly one of strength and hope, but there is no doubt that many other victims have not fared as well.

"Coincidentally," he continued, "Mum passed away two years ago...The date is very easy for us to remember as it was Sept. 11, 2008."

Wiping away tears, I shook my head in disbelief. I can't help but wonder about the timing.

Although nine years have passed since Sept. 11, for many it is as if it happened yesterday. For even more people, the scars of terrorism will be there for generations.

I don't know if I believe if things happen for a reason, but I do know that giving them reason is all most people can accomplish.

Try taking a moment out of your day, remember the victims of terrorism and try to do something to make the world a better place.

The man behind The Prime Ministers

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Yehuda Avner sits behind his desk, surrounded by neat stacks of paper, shelves of files and walls filled with photos and newspaper clippings. He calls this space, a storage locker beneath a building in Jerusalem's Rehavia neighbourhood that he has converted into his office, his "hideaway."

It is in this modest nook that he put together his new less-than-modest 700-page masterpiece, The Prime Ministers: An Intimate Narrative of Israeli Leadership (Toby Press).

"This is my little museum," says Avner, 82, who came to Israel in 1947 from Manchester, U.K., when he was 18.

Yehuda Avner

After becoming a founding member of Kibbutz Lavi in the Galilee, he caught a break that landed him in the Foreign Service in the late 1950s. From there, he became secretary and English speechwriter for prime ministers Levi Eshkol and Golda Meir. He was also adviser to prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin, Menachem Begin and Shimon Peres. Avner also held ambassadorships in London, Australia and Ireland, and posts as consul to the Israeli Embassy in New York and Washington.

Avner retired in 1996, when Peres lost the election and Benjamin Netanyahu became prime minister.

Avner's first work, a non-fiction book called The Young Inheritors – A Portrait of Israel's Children, published in 1982, was his attempt to get into the minds of the first generation of Israeli-born youth – their ideas on Israel, the Diaspora, Arabs, Jews, secular, religious and other issues.

Avner is confident that The Prime Ministers, his second major work, will have a broader readership. Already, it was No. 2 for three months on Steimatsky's English non-fiction bestseller list when it was launched in Israel in March.

The book is a chronological account of Avner's personal experience in Israel, from his arrival to the end of his 40-year diplomatic career. During this time he met, worked closely with and was a fly on the wall around Israel's founding fathers and a foreign minister, Abba Eban, as well as U.S. presidents Ronald Reagan and Jimmy Carter, U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger, Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, British prime minister Margaret Thatcher, Princess Diana and the Lubavitcher Rebbe, to name a few.

The book is based on the author's extraordinarily vivid memories and his newspaper clippings, photographs, notebooks, diaries, minutes, speeches, memorandums, letters and classified government material, from Israel and the United States.

"I've got lots of stuff I shouldn't have, and my book is based upon that," says Avner with a coy smile.

For this reason, the book has already become a major source of academic interest, since it contains a great deal of material that has never been published before. That said, a lot of material that Avner wanted to include in the book was cut by the Israeli censor and by a ministerial committee convened to review the first draft.

"The book would have been 100 pages longer if not for the censor," says Avner.

Still, a lot of juicy tidbits remain. One of the more controversial, according to Avner, was the enmity that existed between Rabin and then defence minister Peres over the Entebbe operation in 1976. "I have that in great detail in my book," says Avner. He was also relieved that the censor had the "good sense" to leave in certain encounters between Israeli prime ministers and their American and British counterparts.

Avner's prime objective was not to be scandalous, but instead to provide as clear a window as possible into this critical chunk of Israeli history. "I am hoping every generation will simply learn about these early years," says the father of four. "That is something very important to me."

This is why he wrote the book in the style of an historical novel and less like a textbook.

"I developed my own genre," says Avner, a self-proclaimed obsessive note-taker and diary keeper.

Avner faced challenges in creating book

"My task was to pump oxygen into these people, to recreate moments and bring episodes back to life as I remember them."

It took him three years to weave these descriptive moments, often scribbled into a notebook on his bedside table, into a single, cohesive narrative. "In the end, it just came together like Lego."

While the structuring of the book came easily to him, Avner faced other challenges in putting it together. The greatest of these was taking responsibility for his re-creations.

"I took a big risk breathing life back into these characters," he says. "In doing so, I took certain storytelling liberties, without impinging too much, I trust, on historical truth."

While he cannot guarantee that the scowl he describes on a president's face, or the laughter of a prime minister is completely accurate, the approval he received from individuals close to some of his characters – among them Harry Horowitz, a longtime Begin associate, and Rabin's daughter, Dalia – have inspired confidence in Avner that he has succeeded in painting an accurate portrayal. This portrayal gets to the heart of some historical truths, as well as Jewish and Israeli ones.

"When I finished my last sentence, I leaned back, paused, closed my eyes and thought to myself, '60-odd years after the State of Israel is established, and nothing fundamental has changed.'"

For starters, he says, the Palestinian conflict is much in the same place. Setting aside the Muslim-fundamentalist-led conversion of the conflict from a political [Arab vs. Israeli] to a theological [Muslim vs. Jew] one, the core practical issues of a Palestinian-Israeli peace remain the same – lack of trust between parties, final border issues, refugees and the nature of the proposed Palestinian entity.

"If you compare the qualitative natures of the Palestinian state proposed by [current] Prime Minister [Benjamin] Netanyahu today with that presented to [then-Egyptian president Muhammad Anwar El] Sadat by Begin, there is virtually no difference," says Avner, adding that in both cases, the proposed Palestinian entity would have no army and would have its airspace controlled, along with its relations with foreign governments.

"For Begin, it was 'autonomy, plus' and, for Netanyahu, it's 'statehood, minus.'"

The external threats facing the state are also similar. Today's primary threat is from a nuclear Iran, while in Avner's day Israel's existence was threatened by the combined forces of Egypt, Jordan and Syria.

He recalls a meeting he had with Rabin during the Six Day War, in which it was revealed to him that on the morning of June 5, 1967, when Israel sent its air force to destroy Egypt's air force, only six planes remained in Israel to defend the country in the event of a counter-attack.

"I can honestly say that one of the most terrifying periods of my life were the three weeks leading up to the Six Day War," he says. "The nature of the threats may be different, but the fact is that Israel is still confronting an existential threat. The biggest challenge facing Israel today is still survival."

This thought consumed him while drafting the book. "I have grappled much with the question of why. Why it is that after all these decades, our legitimacy is still being questioned and we are virtually isolated in the international community," he says, pointing out that Israel belongs to no geographic entity in the United Nations, to no power bloc such as NATO and to no economic space like the European Union.

"We have nobody in the world that is our natural kith and kin, nobody who will stand by us in natural solidarity. Why is that? It's a philosophic question, it's a diplomatic question, it's a political question and it may also be a religious question."

Avner's explanation of Israel's loneliness among the nations goes to the very crux of Jewish identity.

"Our identity is unique in the family of nations. It begins with the Exodus from Egypt where we entered history as a people, and the giving of the Torah at Sinai where we entered history as a faith. Ever since, we have walked through history with this duality. We are the only ethnic group in the world, in terms of modern statehood, in which we are at one in the same time a people and a religion."

This dichotomy, he says, is as disturbing to Jews as it is to non-Jews and accounts for much of Israel's internal socio-cultural tensions, namely those between the state's religious and secular populations.

"It is an uneasy coexistence," says Avner. "While some would like to see the two components of Jewish identity torn apart, others say no way."

Under the circumstances, he says, Israel has developed remarkably well. "Until 1948, we were the objects of history. Since 1948 forward we became the subjects of history, and for the first time in 20 centuries carried the responsibility of power."

Given that Israel comprises individuals from more than 80 countries, the overwhelming majority from places with no democratic experience, Israeli democracy is a marvel.

Global anti-Semitism: a 'crisis of modernity'

By HERSHELL EZRIN

Anti-Semitism may be the oldest hatred, but its resistance to eradication rests upon its purveyors' uncanny ability to reinvent and restate ancient anti-Semitic tropes in new virulent forms. This was one of the key messages I took away from the recent Yale Experts conference examining the rise of a veritable smorgasbord menu of attacks across the globe: from the lingering impacts of Nazi propaganda on Islamist and Arab circles to the 21st-century Holocaust deniers, from the genocidal anti-Semitism espoused by Iranian leaders to the rejection of national states by postmodern academic and feminist circles, from self-hatred to the marriage of convenience of extreme right and left views with respect to Jews and Israel, where frequently no distinction exists.

Hershell Ezrin

With the spread of the Internet and new methods of social media interaction, so-called "digital anti-Semitism" has flourished, aided and abetted by the marginal economics of this new technology.

More than 100 international academic experts met Aug. 23 to 25 to debate causes, trends and potential remedies under the auspices of the Yale Initiative for the Interdisciplinary Study of Anti-Semitism and the International Association for the Study of Anti-Semitism. The conference took as its perspective that global anti-Semitism is a "crisis of modernity." Coming in the months before the November 2010 International Parliamentary Conference on Combating Anti-Semitism to be co-sponsored by the government of Canada and the International Parliamentary Coalition, currently chaired by Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, the deliberations of the Yale conference serve as an important building block for the Ottawa conference.

Last year, a powerful Canadian multi-party delegation headed by Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney played an important role in endorsing the London Declaration, which set out an action plan for countries and parliamentarians to fight the scourge of anti-Semitism. This important work will be advanced in the Ottawa deliberations.

The range of studies and commentary was vast, but certain messages struck home. A common theme is the rejection of the notion that Jews can stop anti-Semitism by changing some of their behaviours or Israel's actions. In a witty keynote address, Prof. Ruth Wisse of Harvard University asked rhetorically "How do we put an end to anti-Semitism? No, really, how do we?" For her, "the situation of the Jew is irrelevant in this political instrumentality… the error is expecting to find within Jews the capacity to fight against anti-Semitism." Citing Jean Paul Sartre, she noted that Jews would have had to be invented if they didn't already exist, as anti-Semitism works by misdirection, with Jews serving as the false cause for other issues. No specific action by Jews will supply a so-called remedial action.

Tony Comper, the former Bank Montreal CEO who, together with his wife Liz, have undertaken groundbreaking work in Canada to launch FAST (Fighting against anti-Semitism together, www.fightingantisemitism.com), has taken the same view. He argues that it is the responsibility of the non-Jewish community to fight this ancient scourge, not Jews. Bringing together some of Canada's most prominent non-Jewish business leaders and refusing to accept financial support from the Jewish community, the Compers have already reached more than 800,000 Canadian school children in an award-winning program that's without parallel elsewhere.

Parliamentary conference to continue discussion

The rise of Islamist anti-Semitism was detailed by several speakers, including Menachem Milson of MEMRI and Jeffrey Herf, author of a troubling study of Nazi propaganda in the Arab world and its after-effects in postwar militant Islam. Milson repeatedly shows that current Arab and Iranian television make no distinction between Jews and Israel. He adds the challenging footnote that often the eyes of the world are blind to Arab anti-Semitism, the messages ignored, because of the implications for "undermining the peace process between Arabs and Israelis." Further, he argues that the Muslim treatment of Jews during the Muslim Golden Age has been used as an inoculation against current-day charges of reverting to anti-Semitism.

While showing the indigenous roots of anti-Semitism in the Qur'an or subsequent liturgical writings (references to Jews as apes and pigs, their attempts to poison the prophet and the stones and trees call to kill the Jews), Milson finds that much has been imported into modern Arab anti-Semitism. From the blood libels of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion to Holocaust denial (or the sense that if the Holocaust occurred, Jews deserved to be punished) to the murder of Jesus, the dehumanization and demonization of Jews is clear and consistent. Herf concludes that the rise of Islamism is a "labour of selective tradition" and he, like Milson, laments that there not enough Arab voices ready to oppose any racism, including anti-Semitism. Instead, a double standard is practised of opposition to some forms of racism, such as Islamaphobia, but not others.

In a provocative discussion of trends in worldwide anti-Semitism in 2009, Prof. Dina Porat of Tel Aviv University asks and then rejects the idea that the Arab-Israeli conflict is alone the source of anti-Semitism. She argues that the Middle East is "the match that lights the fire but that the wood [the fuel] for the fire lies elsewhere in the problems of Europe today." Noting that some of the major tracked rises in violent anti-Semitic incidents over the past decade had no ready reference point in Arab-Israeli matters but in other events, such as the first Gulf War, the war in Afghanistan or challenges about the integration of foreign workers in Europe.

Islamist anti-Semitism on agenda

For Porat, the Middle East situation is also used to crystallize identity and capture young people's interest in the Muslim world. Islamists and radical leftists find common cause in their anti-American, anti-globalization, anti-colonialist and anti-fascist agendas. In the search for current-day martyrs such as the Palestinians, the Holocaust is actually inverted and used against Jews as a source of demonization of their actions for people who should know better.

Robert Fine of Sussex University in the United Kingdom, explores the left's belief that its current actions are neither anti-Semitic nor in support of contemporary anti-Semitism in Europe. For the left, political and genocidal anti-Semitism of the 19th and 20th century is tied to a period of European history in which ethnic nationalism and colonialism prevailed. With the emergence of the post-national, post-colonial era (as evidenced in the the emergence of the European Union, for example), anti-Semitism is a spent force, a racism of the past. Anti–Semitism is no longer seen as a problem except for a few right-wing bigots. The new racism that the left must fight is Islamaphobia. In a breathtaking leap of logic, the left is actually hostile to those who currently fight anti-Semitism among the left and charge that it is being wrong-headed. Rejecting the claim that anti-Semitism is present in Europe today, the radical left sees these charges as nothing more than a self-serving reference of a powerful lobby. In the radical left view, current attacks on the left seek to privilege the suffering of the Jews over others' suffering. To this is added the notion that the term anti-Semitism is now abused and overused in order to prevent or censor debate about legitimate issues, such as Israeli actions.

Led by an incisive evening discourse by Cotler on genocidal anti-Semitism as practised by the Iranian leadership and required global actions, several other speakers focused on the uniquely disquieting efforts funded by Iran and channelled through non-state actors to promote and expand anti-Semitism. Phyllis Chesler of the City University of New York animated a provocative panel on the history and psychological roots of anti-Semitism among feminists. Case studies of remedies in disparate parts of the world were presented.

Messages about the strands of evolution of anti-Semitism were clarified. But one of the Yale conferences unique achievements was to allow for a clearer focus on the profound changes in the means of distribution. Rabbi Abraham Cooper of the Simon Wiesenthal Center set out examples of digital anti-Semitism in its hideous manifestations. It was left to one of the founders of the precursors to the Internet, Prof. Abraham Wagner of Columbia University, who ran the U.S. Department of Defence's Defence Advanced Research Projects Agency, to explain the unique power and capability of the Internet and social media to spread hate, free of charge and with a reach and access unparalleled in history.

The themes raised at Yale will continue to be explored in the November parliamentary conference and in the parallel international experts' conference in Ottawa this fall. The focus on remedies and commitments by states and individual leaders who can make a difference suggests the battle to combat anti-Semitism is reaching a new and welcome phase.

Hershell Ezrin was the founding CEO of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) and is coordinator of the Ottawa International Experts' Forum, to be held Nov. 7 to 9.

At prayer in the morning

In search of a minyan

By CHERYL APPLEBY JACKSON
Special to The CJN

I have said Kaddish twice a day with a minyan since my father's funeral this past February. Mostly, I stand with chaverim and my family – my mother, my brother, my sister, and my husband – at Adath Israel Congregation. For three days during the shloshim (the first 30 days of mourning,) I stayed at my daughter's house in the Annex due to renovations in my home and sought the comfort that I was used to among a downtown community that was unfamiliar to me.

My husband was excited to join me for the Minchah/Ma'ariv service the first Wednesday evening at Congregation Anshei Minsk in Kensington Market.

Not only had he had his bar mitzvah there, but it seems we own seats there in perpetuity. When my father-in-law passed away, we inherited seat 12 in the men's section and seat 12 in the women's section, which were purchased by his grandfather. We even found his name on the plaque in the main foyer – he was a president of the synagogue.

The synagogue still looks impressive from the outside, but the entrance during the week through a side door into a dingy basement was disappointing.

The rabbi greeted us warmly, and when he heard that I was the one saying Kaddish, he announced to the half dozen men milling about that Minchah/Ma'ariv would take place upstairs in the main sanctuary, not in the basement as was the custom during the week.

I was directed upstairs to the women's balcony, although the only other gentleman who spoke to me – the charming Ben, who we were to see many times in our travels – suggested I just sit at the back or in a separate row of the main floor.

As it was, I was quite content to sit alone, well above the distractions on the main floor. I thought of the many people who had once filled these seats and felt a deep sadness as I looked around at the dust and dirt and grime covering everything.

We waited quite a while for the requisite 10 men, and then began the traditional service.

Thursday morning, I left bright and early for the minyan at the Miles Nadal JCC.

In the course of my research over the preceding days, I had seen a notice in The CJN that said to call Coleman Bernstein for information. Coleman assured me that they never lacked a minyan for their regular Thursday morning services, and not only was I welcome, but I should plan to join them for breakfast after the davening.

When I entered the light-filled chapel, a very nice man introduced himself to me as Coleman, while others busied themselves providing us with siddurim and seats.

There was one other woman in a room full of men, who arrived just after we began Shacharit. Everyone was friendly, especially once they learned that I was saying Kaddish for my father, who was known to many of the daveners.

I felt a wonderful sense of comfort, being surrounded by kindness and warmth, both during the service and at the kiddush/breakfast afterward.

Feeling at home there, I asked if it would be possible to put together a minyan for Thursday night or Friday morning. Unfortunately, they only met on Thursday mornings and Sunday mornings.

But I was in luck for the following morning. The Markham Street Shul (Congregation Shaarei Tzedek) was organizing a minyan for someone who was completing the 11 months of Kaddish, and I would be welcome to join the few men who were going there for Shacharit.

The only minyan I could find for Thursday evening was at the Minsker shul again.

I was intrigued by 'traditional egalitarian'

I went down the stairs, but the rabbi wasn't there and the man with the beard, black suit and tzitzit who greeted me told me to sit in the office behind the door, while the service was held in the basement room.

I was very pleased to see Ben there, because with his support, the minyan was again moved upstairs, and I had the women's section to myself.

The few men seemed to be a cross-section of ages and backgrounds, but I'm not sure, because no one else spoke to me.

Eventually, more men drifted in until there were nine people milling around. I was number 10. We waited and waited, and waited.

Forty-five minutes later, I called my husband, who was driving in from Brampton, to come directly to the synagogue, as we were still waiting for a minyan. We began as he walked in, and I saw below me the men's ranks swell to 10 and then 11 as another latecomer (who had attended Minchah elsewhere at 1 p.m.) joined us for what he thought would be Ma'ariv.

Friday morning, the traditional service started a little late as we waited for the guests for whom the minyan was arranged – but I was welcomed warmly. I sat in the women's pew, which was one of the four sections of wooden benches surrounding the wooden bimah.

Soon I was joined by the wife of the man saying his last Kaddish and who was leading the service. Small Jewish world – I had last seen him when we were in Grade 10 together. We enjoyed breakfast and reminiscing, and I was very moved by the words he spoke about his mother, a beloved teacher at Associated Hebrew Schools.

Although there are sometimes Friday night services at other venues, that night the only service, billed as a traditional egalitarian service, was at the First Narayever Congregation, a short walk down Brunswick Avenue. I was intrigued by what "traditional egalitarian" would mean.

The sanctuary was comfortable and renovated, but more importantly, the rabbi was warm and welcoming. A young woman chanted the traditional Shabbat service, and she had a lovely melodious voice. I did find the addition of the Matriarchs to traditional prayers distracting and I'm not sure if I agree with it, but the service as a whole was a pleasant, welcoming way to have Kabalat Shabbat.

The Narayever also has a well-attended Shabbat morning service, followed by a full luncheon/kiddush that everyone is invited to. It was very nice to see families with young children enjoying the service, and the nursery/children's service as well.

As we walked home in the pouring rain, we talked about the downtown Toronto Jewish community as we had experienced it. For Saturday evening, we would be back home at Adath Israel, because there was no minyan to be found south of St. Clair Avenue.

Since our downtown sojourn, we have attended services regularly at Adath Israel, but on occasion at Beth Tzedec Congregation. It is located conveniently, has times that often fit our schedules and never lacks a minyan.

We've also been to Beth Radom Congregation for its 6 p.m. Friday minyan, when Shabbat dinner is held at my daughter's home, and once to Holy Blossom, which is closer to my home and provided grape juice and challah for my four-year-old grandson.

But the warmest and most welcoming minyan is when we make our own on a Friday night at my brother's home, where he provides the 18-year old Scotch for our "l'chaim" l'chaim.

I think of my dad, Moishe Appleby, of blessed memory, and how he was always the first to make a minyan and lead the service for others. There is a succouring that takes place as we say the Kaddish together. At that time my father is with us, and his memory sustains us as we say, "Amen."

Cheryl Appleby Jackson is saying Kaddish for her father, Moishe Appleby.

Pioneering spirit still alive and well

"As messy as our system is, I wouldn't change it," says Avner. "Every group has its representation, every group has its safety valve."

Israel's political echelon has developed significantly since Avner's arrival. The system has emancipated not only the Sephardi immigrant community but also all minority and new immigrant populations. "Israel's democracy has developed enormously in every way," he says. "I'm talking about freedom of organization, freedom of the press and freedom of political organization."

At the same time, the pioneering Zionist spirit that existed among Diaspora Jews of his day is alive and well today. "You only have to look at the letters-to-the-editor column of the Jerusalem Post," he says. Nowhere is this spirit stronger than in the Canadian Jewish community, which Avner visited several times throughout his career.

"I love the Canadian Jewish community. It's a community that has its priorities right in terms of its investment in Jewish education," he says. "Toronto, in particular, is an outstanding community in the Jewish world."

It's communities such as Toronto that give Avner hope for the Jewish future. He's also hopeful about Israel's future. "I see a future of peace," he says, adding that first Iran will have to be neutralized, (and thereby south Lebanon and the Gaza Strip as well) and that it will be necessary to help the Palestinians build their economy and establish their emerging middle class.

"This is a process, a historic process," he says. "It won't lead immediately to peace, but to pragmatic coexistence based on mutual interests, and that is a good start."

As for his own future, Avner predicts another book. "I have another one up here," he says, tapping on his temple. Although he refused to give details, he says he has already begun researching.

Finally, he offers one clue. "Again, I want to take a period and turn it into a story," he says.

The Prime Ministers was released in North America on Sept. 1. Avner tours North America, with a few stops in Canada, from Oct. 19 to Dec. 4. The Prime Ministers is available on Amazon and at Judaica stores in Toronto and Montreal. For more information, visit yehudaavner.com.

Preparing for Rosh Hashanah in Gambia

I'm spiritually, religiously and culturally on my own

By JOSH SCHEINERT

For those who know me, my Jewishness is quite apparent. But that's largely because of my affinity for Jackie Mason, the word oy, and knishes. As a mostly secular Jew in a secular society that "gets" Judaism, I haven't had to worry much about "being" Jewish. There's family, Friday nights and the police officers who stopped traffic outside of my shul on High Holidays to help facilitate my Jewish identity.

Recently, I moved to Gambia, a West African country you can't even find on the map, it's so small. Some 90 per cent of the population is Muslim. Ramadan ends the day before Rosh Hashanah.

Instead of the shofar each morning to mark the month of Elul, I hear the muezzin's call to prayer. On the beach, in the hallway outside my office and on sidewalks, one can always see people stopping what they are doing in order to roll out their prayer mats during the day's designated prayer times. A cellphone company is giving away 12 trips to the Haj in Mecca. I don't think I'm eligible.

For the first time in my life I'm somewhere that doesn't "get" Judaism. It's not that I feel lost, or even so out of place. Instead it's something intangible. I'm at once spiritually, religiously and culturally on my own.

I've never had to think so hard before about my Jewish identity, what it means to me and how I'm going to maintain it. I've gotten some assistance on some of the essentials. My cantor at Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto, Tibor Kovari, lent me the entire High Holiday service on CD for me to upload onto iTunes (an Apple first maybe?), and Israel's bookstore gave me a deal on travel-size machzors. And I brought a kippah.

Josh Scheinert

From a religious perspective, I'm equipped. I might be without a minyan, but I have the means to conduct services. Yet, I'm still missing something. What had been growing more and more latent is now making itself known – a desire to be a part of something, a community.

A rabbi might disagree, but it's become apparent that my Judaism is as much about people as it is about God. Sure, God brings people together, but you can't make a brisket for just one person – the leftovers would take weeks to finish – and my Rosh Hashanah includes brisket (my mother's, to be exact). So as the New Year approached, I appreciated more than I ever have before how essential culture is to our religion and how it fosters one's sense of identity.

But please don't take the above as me kvetching about my circumstances. I'm not all that upset. In a way, I think it's kind of neat. Not only am I discovering myself in new ways, but now yom tov candles will glow somewhere new, apples and honey might become a new staple in the Muslim West African diet, and a male goat (there are no rams here) might lose his horns.

Shanah Tovah from Banjul.

Josh Scheinert of Toronto is a visiting lecturer in the faculty of law at the University of The Gambia.

Netanyahu, Abbas each give a little on first day of talks

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Tell us what you want. Now listen to what your partner wants. Now tell us what your partner wants.

In slow, almost excruciating increments, talks between Israelis and Palestinians are taking on the dimensions of a counselling session moderated by the United States.

Heading into a White House dinner last Wednesday evening with President Barack Obama and the Jordanian and Egyptian leaders, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas outlined their bottom lines: security and recognition for the Jewish state, settlement halts and final-status negotiations for Abbas.

By mid-morning Thursday, when they met in the upper reaches of the U.S. State Department beneath the watchful eye of a portrait of Benjamin Franklin in the cavernous room named for the first U.S. secretary of state, it was clear that some mediation had taken place.

Netanyahu was more forthcoming about final-status talks, if not settlements. Abbas was just as adamant about Israeli concessions, but was more forthcoming about understanding Israel's security needs. A little later on, George Mitchell, the top U.S. envoy to the region, took a break from talks with the two leaders to announce that they had agreed to meet in their home region in two weeks, around Sept. 14 or 15, and to follow up with meetings every two weeks afterward.

Mitchell said the first goal was to reach a "framework agreement" that would outline the necessary compromises, and then work out the details that would flesh out a full agreement. Setting a cordial tone was key, he said.

"We have encouraged the parties to be positive in their outlook and in their actions," Mitchell said.

"I believe these two leaders – President Abbas and Prime Minister Netanyahu – are committed to doing what it takes to achieve the right results," Mitchell told reporters, explaining that after the Sept. 14-15 round of talks, negotiation teams, headed by the two leaders, would meet every two weeks.

"They agreed that for these negotiations to succeed, [the talks] must be kept private and treated with sensitivity," Mitchell said, adding that "both Netanyahu and Abbas condemned all forms of violence that target innocent civilians. They reiterated a common goal of two states for two peoples."

"They agreed these negotiations can be completed in one year. They agreed that the logical next step will be working and achieving a frame agreement – establishing a necessary compromise that will lead to the treaty," Mitchell added.

"They agreed that in their actions and statements they will create atmosphere conducive to agreement," the Mideast envoy went on to say.

In her opening remarks at a news conference Thursday morning with the two leaders, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton made it sound as if half the battle was getting to the point of talking.

"I know the decision to sit at this table was not easy," Clinton said. "We understand the suspicion and skepticism that so many feel, worn out after years of conflict and frustration."

But Clinton pressed the parties to get to the core issues – the fate of Jerusalem, the Palestinian-Israeli borders, the question of Palestinian refugees – quickly. "We are convinced that if you move forward in good faith and do not waver on behalf of your people, we can resolve all of the core issues within one year," she said.

That remains to be seen, of course. Critics have said that lip service and photo-ops may be the only achievement to come out of this summit and the negotiations that follow. For the time being, merely holding a meeting to launch talks gives each leader something to take back home. Obama will get credit for relaunching direct negotiations between Palestinians and Israelis after a two-year hiatus. Netanyahu will be able to argue to the world and to the Israeli public that he's interested in serious negotiations. If there are gains for the Palestinians, Abbas will be able to show the Palestinians they can wring concessions from Israel by talking, not by violence of the Hamas variety.

Netanyahu, who until now has insisted that security and incitement are his more immediate priorities, suggested he's interested in more than the appearance of talks and that he's ready to go to the more vexing core issues.

"The core issues that you described, Madam Secretary, are things we have disagreements on, but we have to get from disagreements to agreement," he said at Thursday's news conference.

Netanyahu, who on Wednesday evening recognized a Palestinian claim to the land of Israel – a breakthrough for the scion of a family and tradition that for decades upheld an exclusive Jewish claim to the land – told Abbas that he "respects" the Palestinian right to sovereignty.

For his part, Abbas, whose remarks at the White House dinner constituted a laundry list of Palestinian plaints, was expansive Thursday morning in acknowledging Israel's security needs, especially in the wake of two terrorist attacks in two days that left four Israeli civilians dead, including a pregnant woman.

"We not only condemned them but also followed on the perpetrators and found the car that was used and arrested those who sold and bought the car," he said, touting the performance of a Palestinian security service he said was still "young." "Security is of essence, it is vital for both of us. We cannot allow for anyone to do anything that would undermine your security and our security."

At the same time, each leader held their ground on significant differences that threaten, even at this early stage, to derail the talks. Abbas has threatened to bolt the talks unless Netanyahu extends a 10-month partial moratorium on settlement building that expires on Sept. 26. Netanyahu has indicated that he will let the moratorium lapse and will not reintroduce it until an agreement is in place. Abbas gave no ground on Netanyahu's demand that Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state, telling him that it was in enough in 1993 that Palestinians recognized Israel. Netanyahu holds that recognition of a Jewish claim is key to ending the Palestinian culture of incitement, which he says is a cause of terrorism. "In this document we give enough to show our intentions are good," Abbas said.

The meetings got started Thursday with a meeting of the two negotiating teams, and then broke up into one meeting between Mitchell, Clinton, Abbas and Netanyahu in Clinton's office, and another between the negotiating teams to work out the details of the mid-September follow-up meeting. After that, Mitchell reported, Abbas and Netanyahu went into a face-to-face meeting.

Abbas fears Hamas could still play spoiler to peace talks

By AMOS HAREL and AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

A few seconds after the speeches by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu (who said little new), came smiles, a warm handshake and an intimate conversation between the two leaders. U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton sat between them, nodding. Netanyahu and Abbas have never before been seen so close to each other.

That may be the main reason for optimism ahead of the expected wrestling match between the two leaders' teams in the negotiations that lie ahead.

Until last Thursday, Netanyahu and Abbas conveyed a sense of mutual contempt. If even the slightest amount of trust has been created between them, this would be the greatest American achievement so far.

But on Sept. 26, the two face a challenge: the end of the construction freeze in the territories. There was consensus in Ramallah yesterday among both Abbas' Fatah party and his inner circle that if the moratorium does not continue, Abbas will not be able to continue the direct talks.

That would mean a prolonged impasse, at least until the next elections in Israel. And for the 75-year-old PA president, it would also deal a blow to his own standing and that of his party in the territories, leading many Palestinians to conclude that Hamas was right and force is the only language Israel understands.

Aware of the huge effort the Islamist group is investing in torpedoing the talks, Abbas told Netanyahu that the PA security forces are doing everything possible to catch the perpetrators of last week's shooting attack near Hebron.

Both Israeli and Palestinian sources said the security forces have a lead to the identity of the perpetrators and last Thursday's dragnet may have captured one of them.

Another positive development is that, unlike in the past, Israel did not blame the PA for the attacks. On the contrary, Israel holds the PA security forces in high esteem.

An Israeli officer who has been following developments said, only half jokingly, that over the past two days, the PA security forces have arrested every Palestinian who said the word Hamas more than twice a day.

Face to Face in Washington

Americans said to be pressuring the PA

But the PA fears that unknown sleeper cells might perpetrate attacks in the hope of provoking a harsh Israeli response, or settler violence, that would force Abbas to halt the talks.

Over the past few weeks, PA forces have stopped many couriers bringing cash from abroad to Hamas. They are teachers, doctors and merchants. Such people are a real threat to the PA: coming in below its intelligence radar, these individuals could commit the next terror attack.

The money trail reveals that Hamas had been making increasing use of Palestinian businessmen working overseas. They buy merchandise abroad with Hamas money, sell it and give the money to Hamas operatives in the West Bank.

Hamas, for its part, is not even trying to hide its intentions. Last Thursday, senior Hamas official Mahmoud Zahar said the group wants to liberate the West Bank, just as it liberated the Gaza Strip. That means more attacks in the near future.

In related developments, a senior Palestinian source told Ha'aretz that the American administration renewed its pressure on Abbas to stay in direct negotiations with Israel, even if some construction in the settlements resumes after the end of the current moratorium. The source warned that Abbas would not be able to agree to a renewal of construction and will be forced to withdraw from the talks.

According to the source, a Palestinian OK to the renewal of construction just as direct talks are resumed is politically impossible. Sources in Ramallah said that both the Israelis and Americans know Abbas' likely course of action. At first, Abbas will demand that the talks not last longer than a year, culminating with the establishment of a Palestinian state in the 1967 borders, and with Jerusalem as its capital.

Abbas would not be able to give up Palestinian sovereignty in east Jerusalem and especially the Temple Mount, but large Jewish neighbourhoods would be retained by Israel. If this much is achieved, Abbas will be able to agree that the refugee issue will be resolved primarily within the borders of the new Palestinian state, with only a few tens of thousands receiving Israeli citizenship as a humanitarian gesture.

At the moment, the PA does not seem to be determined to demand Israel take historical responsibility for the refugee problem. In earlier negotiations, the PA traditionally insisted each refugee be allowed to choose from several choices of compensation, including financial remuneration and a return to Israel proper, subject to an agreed quota.

The PA would also agree to a presence of NATO, but not Israel Defence Forces troops, in the West Bank and the Jordan Valley, and would only agree to land swaps at a ratio of 1:1 in size and quality – in other words, it would not agree to swap fertile West Bank lands for Israeli deserts.

A key contention could arise around the future of the large settlement of Ariel. The PA does not believe it can agree to the city being annexed to Israel in a future agreement, since it's located near the middle of the West Bank, cutting into the territorial contiguity of a future state.

However, the PA might agree to allow some settlers to remain as Palestinian citizens and realizes other settlement blocs – Gush Etzion, Maaleh Adumim and the Jewish neighbourhoods around Jerusalem – will remain in Israeli hands in a future agreement.

Toronto International Film Festival

A preview of TIFF feature films and documentaries

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A complex Montreal Jewish man looks back at his turbulent life, trying to make sense of it.

Mossad agents embark on a mission to capture a Nazi war criminal.

The ambitious Jewish governor of an important U.S. state resigns following a sensational sex scandal.

A Palestinian mother and an Israeli physician join forces to save her sick baby.

These are among the themes of some of the feature films and documentaries due to be screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival, which runs from Sept. 9 to 19.

Mordechai Richler's satiric novel, Barney's Version, which was published four years before his untimely death in 2001 and is generally considered to be one of his finest works, has finally been brought to the screen.

Directed by Richard Lewis and starring Paul Giamatti as Barney Panofsky, the lead character, Barney's Version turns on an impulsive and politically incorrect TV producer who tries to prevent his past from derailing his future.

The Debt, a thriller starring Academy Award winner Helen Mirren and adapted from an Israeli film, unfolds on two levels.

A Nazi war criminal who was supposedly rubbed out by Mossad agents 30 years ago may not have been killed after all, prompting the Mossad to launch a new mission to track him down.

Precious Life, an Israeli documentary by TV journalist Shlomi Eldar, charts the struggle of a Palestinian woman from the Gaza Strip to save her four month-old son, who was born without an immune system.

He will die unless he receives a bone marrow transplant, which can only be performed in an Israeli hospital. Being anti-Israel, the mother's family and friends object to surgery in Israel. The mother herself believes that suicide bombings are legitimate.

These moral and political dilemmas form the heart and soul of Precious Life, which was premiered at the Jerusalem Film Festival.

Miral, by Julian Schnabel, opens as a Palestinian woman establishes an orphanage in Jerusalem after the 1948 Arab-Israeli war. Thirty years later, a seven-year-old orphan named Miral is admitted. When she is 17, the first Palestinian uprising erupts, forcing her to make an extremely difficult decision hinging on romantic love and ideology.

A scene from The Matchmaker

The Israeli Arab actress Hiam Abbass stars as the director of the orphanage, while Freida Pinto (Slumdog Millionaire) assumes the role of Miral.

Tears of Gaza, by Norwegian director Vibeke Lokkeberg, graphically examines the human cost of Israel's invasion of Gaza on the lives of its Palestinian inhabitants.

The reason for Israel's military operation, the firing of rockets at Israeli villages and towns near the border by Palestinian rejectionists, is conspicuously missing.

This documentary also looks at Israel's siege of Gaza, which has been controlled by Hamas for the past three years.

Eran Riklis' The Human Resources Manager, a tragi-comedy, is set in Israel and is about the manager of an industrial bakery who can only save its reputation by taking a coffin to Romania.

Seasoned Israeli actress Gila Almagor has a starring role.

The Matchmaker, by Avi Nesher, takes place in Haifa in 1968 as a teenaged boy takes a summer job with a Holocaust survivor, who opens his eyes to realities he never imagined.

A tender story of love, loss and survival, The Matchmaker is also an exploration of a fledgling country.

The Rise and Fall of Eliot Spitzer chronicles the fall from grace of the ferociously ambitious and hypocritical Jewish governor of New York, who admitted he had used the services of prostitutes.

Alex Gibney's film consists of interviews with Spitzer, the escort he met most often and Spitzer's enemies.

Casino Jack is a biopic of Jack Abramoff, a prominent Washington, D.C. Jewish businessman and lobbyist who went to prison after being convicted of fraud. Currently living in a halfway house, he is due to be released in December.

This docudrama charts the dubious career of a con artist par excellence.

Israeli feature film is both sad and comical

Mark Ivanir, right, and Guri Alfi in The Human Resources Manager.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A suicide bombing in Jerusalem and a burial in Romania

Eran Riklis' The Human Resources Manager, which will be screened at the Toronto International Film Festival on Sept. 13, 15 and 19, is framed and defined by these disparate events.

When a Romanian woman named Yulia, an employee of a large bakery in Jerusalem, is killed by a Palestinian terrorist in yet another attack in the second year of the second Palestinian uprising, the company is thrown into disarray.

A newspaper reporter (Guri Alfi) writes a story charging that the bakery exhibited indifference and inhumanity in failing to claim her body at the morgue. The truth is more complicated, of course, but the director of the company, a sober woman with a frown (Gila Almagor), fears that the article will have adverse effects on sales.

She summons the human resources manager (Mark Ivanir), a glum fellow who does not really like his job, and instructs him to clear up the mess as soon as possible to head off a public relations disaster.

After Yulia is positively identified, he makes arrangements for her corpse to be flown to Romania and given a proper burial in her hometown.

Until this point, The Human Resources Manager is uniformly gloomy. But after the manager and the pesky reporter arrive in Romania with Yulia's coffin in tow, it veers off temporarily into the realm of comic relief.

The multilingual Israeli consul (Rosina Kambus) who greets them at the ragged airport is both zany and serious.

In breezy and flirtatious tones at odds with her position as a diplomat, she introduces her Romanian boyfriend as the vice-consul (Julian Negulesco).

But in a grim warning of what may lie ahead, she warns the manager that Romania, formerly a Communist country, lies suspended between east and west and is not exactly regarded as a plum posting.

Barely having disembarked from the plane, the manager quickly learns that Romania is not, shall we say, like Canada or Britain.

Sensing that Yulia's body will not be released unless money changes hands, the manager takes the initiative and leaves a bribe with a policeman.

It's clear that rampant corruption is one of the legacies of communism.

Romania itself is depicted as a bleak, forlorn and underdeveloped land of rundown apartment blocks, aging factories and lousy roads.

The manager, in his conscientious effort to track down Yulia's relatives, stumbles upon a dysfunctional family.

Yulia's ex-husband (Bogdan Stanoevitch) hardly has the time of day for him, while her 14-year-old son (Noah Silver), who appears to resent and dislike his father, is scruffy, rebellious, non-communicative and seemingly homeless.

Far from being discouraged by this motley cast of characters, the manager, divorced himself, carries on, determined to lay Yulia to rest.

But troubles loom on the horizon. The supposedly reputable driver of the van who is transporting Yulia's remains cannot proceed after being stopped by the police. Nor, due to a maddening technicality, can the manager inter Yulia in her hometown.

Being resourceful and flexible, the manager, in typical Israeli style, surmounts these transient difficulties. In doing so, he rediscovers his humanity and comes to appreciate qualities such as patience and tolerance.

Alternately sad and quirky, The Human Resources Manager is a solidly crafted film, ably directed by Riklis.

He wrings fine performances from the actors, particularly Ivanir, whose hangdog face communicates empathy, shrewdness and world weariness.

Though small in scale and ambition, it is a film with heart.

Short film about wartime hacker

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Interregnum is a short animated film loosely based on René Carmille, the first known computer hacker, who cracked the Nazi code that marked some of France's population for death during World War II.

It premières at the Toronto International Film Festival this month.

"Their system identified all the Jews they were trying to abduct, all the resistance members, anyone they wanted to target in their complete records," said filmmaker Nick Fox-Gieg about the Nazis' code. By punching holes into a card and feeding it into a machine, the cards could be sorted easily. Punching Column 11 on a person's card indicated that person was slated for execution.

"Carmille figured it out," Fox-Gieg says. "Whatever the reason they wanted to [execute people], those cards had Column 11 in common."

He said the Nazis tried to automate the process but didn't understand the technology. "Essentially this was a giant information technology experiment that backfired from the Nazi point of view."

Since the Nazis lacked training, they were dependent on French clerks to staff offices and prepare and read punch cards, which helped make Carmille's change to the cards successful.

"The remarkable thing is the SS officer overseeing the process would not be able to tell a deadly card from a regular one. The clerks would dump all the cards into a hopper, and the machine would spit out the ones marked for death," said the Toronto-based filmmaker, who created the film after reading Edwin Black's IBM and the Holocaust.

Carmille and his co-workers created a system so that people targeted for the death camps would not have Column 11 punched on their card. Their cards could be put through the data system time after time, but would never come out, thanks to his ingenious plan.

Although there is no documentation on how many people Carmille actually saved, Fox-Gieg believes that Carmille must have been partly responsible for saving some people since the number of French Jews who survived the Holocaust was higher than the number in other countries.

"René had many more exploits. This was his last big caper at the end of the Nazi occupation," Fox-Gieg said. "He was so close – he was on the last death camp train out before liberation. Right at the end of the war, his cover was blown, and he was sent to Dachau where he died."

Filmmaker Nick Fox-Gieg

Fox-Gieg was able to compress the remarkable story into six minutes, a requirement for Bravo!FACT funding.

"Bravo was generous in terms of understanding delays. I waited till we had just the right cast," Fox-Gieg said. The cast includes the voice of actor Colm Feore in a dual role.

Interregnum, one of seven Bravo!FACT films in the festival's Short Cuts Canada lineup, screens at the Art Gallery of Ontario's Jackman Hall, Sept. 13 at 6:30 p.m. and Sept. 14 at 5 p.m. Visit www.fox-gieg.com for more information.

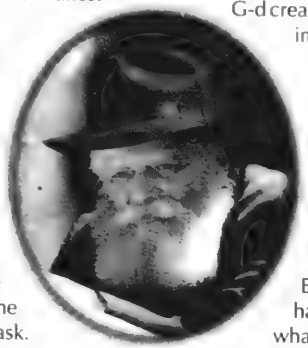
A New Year's Message of
The Lubavitcher Rebbe
Rabbi Menachen M. Schneerson of blessed memory

The eve of a new year calls for self-evaluation and for making the necessary resolutions for the coming year.

Such a "balance sheet" can be valid only if the assessment recognizes the full extent of one's ability.

Only then can one truly regret, the missed opportunities, and resolve to henceforth utilize one's capacities to their fullest extent.



When Adam was created, the Creator immediately apprised him of his powers and told him what his purpose in life would be:

"Replenish the earth, and conquer it; have dominion over the fish of the sea, over the birds of the sky, and over every living thing that exist upon the earth (Gen. 1:28)."

Man was given the power to conquer the whole world and to rule over it, on land, at sea and in the air, and he was enjoined so to do; this was his task.

The "world conquest" which was given to man as his task and mission in life, is to elevate the entire Creation.

Needless to say, before a person sets out to conquer the world, he must first conquer himself, through the subjugation of the earthly and mundane within himself. This is attained through actions which are strictly in accordance with the directives of the Torah, the Law of Life - the practical guide in every-day living, so that the material and mundane become permeated and illuminated with the light of the One G-d, our G-d.

G-d created one man and on this single person on earth He imposed the said duty and task. Herein lies the profound, yet clear, directive, namely, that one man - each and every person is potentially capable of "conquering the world".

If a person does not fulfill his task, and does not utilize his inestimable divine powers - it is not merely a personal loss and failure, but something that affects the destiny of the whole world.

Everyone must therefore ask themselves, How much have they accomplished in this direction, and to what extent have they failed, so that they can make the proper resolutions for the coming year.

G-d, Who looks into the heart, upon seeing the determination behind these good resolutions, will send His blessing for their realization in the fullest measure.

With Best wishes for a Happy, Healthy and Sweet New Year!

Spice of Life

Traditional – and good for your health

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

This week we usher in one of the happiest days of the Jewish calendar, Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year. The holiday begins with a festive erev Rosh Hashanah dinner.

Families attend the first service of the Days of Awe – the 10 holy days when we're called upon to re-examine our lives – to wake up, and not only smell the roses, but plant them for other people to enjoy.

The first day of the Festival of Trumpets is marked by the blowing of the ceremonial shofar and the last ends with its final call – one long note sounding eerily like a human cry – at sundown at the end of Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement.

On this holiest of days, we fast from sunset on Yom Kippur eve to sunset on Yom Kippur day. The idea of fasting is to bring hunger pangs, which make us acutely aware of how difficult it is to face our frailties. And that is why, when the sun goes down and the shofar is blown for the last time, we're almost giddy with spontaneous laughter and shouts of joy, as we wish each other the ultimate greeting for a bright future – Next year in Jerusalem! And we know it's just a matter of moments that we can break our fast and eat.

One of the true miracles of this holiday is that all the mamas and grandmas, even though they've been sitting in synagogue all day with the rest of us, are bustling about the kitchen when we get home. But this evening they'll have a special challenge, because we anticipate the traditional Ashkenazi dishes we were brought up on – recipes handed down from mother to daughter to granddaughter and today, grandson – l'dor vador, l'dor vador – from generation to generation.

Although lately, we've been told that our favourite dishes – chopped liver, blintzes with sour cream, cottage cheese and sour cream kugel to name a few – as delicious as they are, go against everything we've come to know about health and nutrition.

Because these recipes were developed in eastern Europe, where there wasn't a variety of fruits, vegetables and herbs, our ancestors created a cuisine made primarily of starch, and then, according to rabbi and cookbook author Gil Marks, they "added cheap cuts of meat, copious amounts of schmaltz (chicken fat), sugar and salt to impart flavour."

Lately, creative Jewish cooks have been adapting traditional Jewish fare into our health conscious lifestyle. "Healthy Jewish cooking is no longer an oxymoron," Marks says.

Marks modifies many traditional holiday recipes in his The World of Jewish Entertaining (Simon & Schuster). Instead of emphasizing "big chunks of meat," as the Ashkenazim did, he uses meat sparingly, as a flavouring instead of the main event. He uses a lot of recipes from the Sephardim, (Jews who migrated to areas as diverse as North and South Africa, the Middle East, India, and later to the Mediterranean countries of Spain, Italy, Portugal, Bulgaria, Greece and Turkey) where, according to Marks, they use the three main products mentioned in the Bible – grains, wine and olive oil.

As for the traditional Ashkenazi foods, Marks suggests substituting yogurt for sour cream in blintzes, kugels and borscht; using olive oil instead of schmaltz for chopped liver, and even eliminating the liver altogether by substituting vegetables such as mushrooms, onions and string beans. Instead of stuffing chicken with oil-laden bread cubes, he suggests apples and spinach, both traditional for the New Year.

His pièce de-résistance for the High Holidays is his Whole Wheat Challah, which leaves out the eggs and extra fat, using whole wheat, wheat germ and honey to provide moisture. He also suggests sweetening dishes with fruits such as bananas and apples instead of sugar. But he cautions, "You've got to be smart with substitutions. Don't serve a dish just because it's low fat. Experiment until you find the flavour you like. It's actually a very creative process."

Judy Zeidler, author of The Gourmet Jewish Cook and The 30-Minute Kosher Cook, both (William Morrow) emphasizes eating light on Yom Kippur because it's easier on your system after fasting all day. She serves a plethora of salads, many of which combine fish with fruits and vegetables. One of her favourite combinations is smoked fish with cucumber; it's refreshing and it replenishes salts lost by fasting.

Other favourites are beet salads, and chopped herring or sardine with apples and onions. She also serves cold fruit soups with orange juice at their base, or vegetable soups such as fresh tomato and basil, which, if you get the ingredients at their peak of flavour from the farmers market, is a delight, Zeidler says.

HONEY WHOLE-WHEAT CHALLAH

Source: The World of Jewish Entertaining by Gil Marks, Simon & Schuster

Note: If you use dry yeast, the water should be slightly warmer than for fresh yeast.

2 1/4 oz. packages active dry yeast or a 1 oz. cake of fresh yeast
2 1/4 cups warm water for dry yeast
1/3 to 1/2 cup honey
1/4 cup vegetable shortening or oil
1 tbsp. table salt or 4-1/2 tsp. kosher salt
3 1/4 cups whole-wheat flour about 3-1/4 cups unbleached all purpose flour
1 cup raisins or dried currants (or 1/2 cup raisins and 1/2 cup chopped dried apricots or dates (optional)

Dissolve yeast in 1/2 cup of water. Stir in a teaspoon of honey; let stand until foamy, 5 to 10 minutes. Stir in remaining water, remaining honey, shortening, salt and whole-wheat flour. Beat in enough all-purpose flour, 1/2 cup at a time, to make workable dough. Place on a lightly floured surface; knead until smooth and elastic, 10 to 15 minutes. (Lightly oiling your hands before kneading makes whole-wheat dough more manageable.) Knead in dried fruits, if desired. Place in greased large bowl, turning to coat. Cover loosely with plastic wrap or a towel; let rise in a warm, draft-free place until almost double in bulk, about 1-1/2 hours.

Punch down the dough and divide in half or thirds. Shape into rounds, spirals or crowns and place on greased baking sheets. Cover loosely and let rise until double in bulk, about 1 hour.

Preheat oven to 375. Bake until bread is golden brown and sounds hollow when tapped on the bottom, 35 to 45 minutes. Transfer to wire racks and let cool. Makes 2 large or 3 medium loaves.

COLD TOMATO SOUP WITH MOZZARELLA CHEESE

Source: From Judy Zeidler.

This recipe is based on the famous Italian Caprese salad made with tomatoes, mozzarella cheese and basil.

6 medium tomatoes, peeled, seeded and pureed (about 3 cups)
2 tbsp. sugar or to taste
1 2 tsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tsp. salt or more to taste
freshly ground black pepper to taste
2 tbsp. minced fresh basil leaves
6 oz. fresh white mozzarella cheese, cut into 1-inch cubes (optional)
1/2 cup diced cucumbers, peeled (1/2 small cucumber)
1/2 cup fresh corn kernels
extra-virgin olive oil, for garnish

Strain the pureed tomatoes into a glass bowl. Add the sugar, balsamic vinegar, salt and pepper. Add the basil and mix thoroughly. Spoon an equal amount of mozzarella, cucumbers and corn kernels into the centre of 6 shallow bowls and ladle some tomato mixture over each. Drizzle with olive oil and serve. Makes 6 servings.

EASY SARDINE SPREAD

It is important to get very high quality sardines for this dish.

2 tins (4 oz. each) sardine fillets, mashed
2 tbsp. sweet red onion, grated
2 hard boiled eggs, grated
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 tsp. red wine
1/2 tsp. sugar
1 tbsp.fresh dill weed, minced
1 tbsp. fresh chives, minced
pinch of kosher salt and pepper

Combine ingredients and serve with crackers, challah, or fresh vegetables such as cucumber, celery, jicama, tomatoes or Chinese peas.

HOLIDAY VEGETARIAN PATE

1/3 cup shallots, minced
3 plump garlic cloves, minced
olive oil for frying
1 cup mushrooms
1 cup green beans, halved
1/4 cup celery, sliced
1/4 cup Italian parsley
1/4 cup chives
1 cup toasted whole wheat bread crumbs
2 hard boiled eggs, grated
1 tbsp. melted butter
1 tbsp. Worcestershire sauce
1 tbsp. brandy
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
1 tsp. dried thyme
1/4 tsp. ground cloves
kosher salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Slowly sauté shallots and garlic in olive oil for about 5 minutes. Add mushrooms, green beans, celery and parsley and sauté 5 minutes more or until vegetables are crisp tender. Add the remaining ingredients; mix thoroughly. Turn mixture into a food processor and puree until you like the consistency. Serves 6.

Spice of Life

Savoury cholent can be a perfect pre-fast meal

By LINDA MOREL
JTA

At a surprise 40th birthday party for a friend, her mother stood at their stove stirring a huge cauldron of simmering stew. The chicken, flanken, potatoes, carrots, dried peas and barley in the pot emitted an aroma that made the offerings prepared by the caterer brought in by my friend's husband pale in comparison.

"This is Lynda's favourite food," her mother said, dipping a ladle into the depth of the pot and asking me to take a taste. I wasn't expecting to swoon.

"What is this?" I asked.

"Cholent, a Sabbath stew," she said. "But in our family, we eat it all the time."

This party, 22 years ago, was the first time I had even heard the word. I immediately asked for her recipe, which I have been making ever since.

With Yom Kippur beginning this year on a Friday, it occurred to me that the best thing to eat before the fast begins would be chicken cholent. Many Jews customarily consume chicken and rice on erev Yom Kippur.

A one-pot meal brimming with nutritious foods, cholent is a traditional Sabbath dish. However, it is usually served for lunch on Saturdays or as a hot meal immediately after the Havdalah service that brings Shabbat to an end.

My friend's mother, who was born in Germany in the 1920s, told me that every Friday before dusk, the Jewish women in their neighbourhood brought pots full of raw stew ingredients to the Jewish bakery. With sundown approaching, the women would place their stew pots in the oven, just minutes before the baker turned off his oven to observe Shabbat.

Over the next 24 hours, the meat, potatoes and barley, which started out swimming in water, turned into a chunky, mouth-watering cholent to be served steaming hot immediately after the Sabbath.

A signature dish of Ashkenazim, cholent can be made from almost anything. One reason is that in the Old Country, Jews were poor and threw any scrap of food they could find into their stews. However, a traditional cholent is made with meat and meat bones, potatoes, beans and barley. More modern recipes for vegetarian cholents dotted with tofu now abound.

Not to be outdone, Sephardim for centuries have prepared spectacular Sabbath stews infused with the most marvelous seasoning.

In Morocco, this style of stew is called tagine, named for the conical pots in which the dish is prepared. Sabbath stews hail from Egypt, Iraq, Syria and any country where Jews have settled.

Jewish women in Morocco traditionally paid a non-Jew to set up a pile of hot coals. Before sundown on the Sabbath, they carried their tagines full of stew ingredients and sunk them into the coals. Guarding against thieves, the non-Jew watched over their food, which barely bubbled on red hot coals that gradually cooled over the course of a full day.

The key to a good cholent, is to gently simmer the medley of ingredients for many hours. Original recipes entailed 24 hours of low-heat cooking. However, many people new to this lengthy preparation are hesitant to keep food on a fire overnight while they are sleeping. Most recipes turn out well after six to eight hours with the right amount of water. Cholent is a flexible and forgiving dish that can be made in crockpots, inside the oven or on a stovetop.

Detractors of cholent, and there only a few, complain that the stews are brown and unappetizing, with ingredients blurring together until they lose their characteristics. Yet, I find the blend of flavours irresistible and have learned that by adding some ingredients with perky colours, such as tomatoes and carrots, you can overcome the potential of ending up with a khaki-coloured meal.

With erev Yom Kippur falling as the Sabbath begins, this one-pot meal is ideal to serve before the fast. A hearty dish that is filling but not fancy, cholent is in line with Yom Kippur's solemn theme. As it can be prepared hours in advance, cholent is a practical dish for home cooks who want to avoid the last-minute rush that often precedes arriving at Kol Nidrei services on time.

I suggest serving rice with your stew of choice. It's easy to digest, and rice is a balanced accompaniment to a one-pot meal brimming with vegetables and chicken.

A hearty hot stew on this special night carries the warmth and tradition that our ancestors bestowed on our parents and grandparents as they lit Sabbath candles every Friday evening and once a year atoned for their sins.

A word about water. Most stew recipes do not indicate how much water is needed, which many cooks find maddening. However, it's almost impossible to gauge quantities of water because so many factors influence the result, such as temperature and consistency of the heat and the thickness of the pot.

However, if you add too much water to the pot, you'll end up with soup, which is not a terrible fate. Should this happen, it can be remedied by leaving the pot uncovered and raising the flame to cook off some of the excess water.

If you put too little water into the pot, the ingredients are in danger of drying out or even burning. You can always add more water and stir it to combine evenly.

Keep an eye on the pot to check for water levels. Stir at least once every half hour. Ideally the ingredients in your cholent should yield a thickened gravy. However, it doesn't matter how a cholent turns out because thick or thin, this foolproof dish is always delicious and sustaining.

The following recipes are by Linda Morel.

CHICKEN CHOLENT (Ashkenazi Style)

no-stick vegetable spray, optional
8 skinless chicken thighs
4 sweet potatoes
8 carrots
1 parsnip
1 large onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 lb. string beans, cut in half horizontally
1 tbsp. dill, minced
salt to taste
8 tbsp. parsley, minced, optional garnish

Equipment:
Use a large stockpot, preferably of the stick-resistant variety.

Preparation:
If not using a stick-resistant pot, spray its interior generously with no-stick vegetable spray. Rinse chicken under cold water and place in the pot.

Scrape skin from sweet potatoes and cut each into 8 chunks. Scrape carrots and parsnip and cut into 1-in. chunks. To the pot, add the sweet potatoes, carrots, parsnip, onion, garlic string beans and dill.

Question. How long does it normally take from the time of a court date to actually receive payment through the Ontario Government's Family Responsibility Office (FRO)?

Answer. The FRO sends a notice to the employer upon the FRO receiving and registering the "support deduction order" (enforcing the support order). The employer then has 14 days to start making deductions from the next pay period. Employers may remit based on their payroll cycles, which may result in payments being received after the due date specified in the order. If the FRO doesn't know the payer's employer at the time of registration, a pre-authorized payment plan information package is sent to the payer. If the payer returns the form, funds will be taken directly from their bank account on the date they have specified.

Trouble is, if there's a delay in returning the package and the lady who's supposed to be receiving the cash doesn't provide this or other information about income or asset sources, the FRO won't be able to enforce the Order. The FRO does not have an investigative, detective or "forensic accounting" branch that goes out of its way to find someone's source of income or assets. There's no government money for this type of investigative detective work.

Write to your MPP. Until an employer begins deducting support payments or if payments by an employer are interrupted or terminated, it's the payer's direct responsibility to pay. Obviously, the FRO can't forward payments until they've received some information from somebody. It's not public assistance – it's merely a government-run collection agency with little investigative teeth. It will only go after any money that the government might owe the payer, such as for outstanding tax refunds. Or the FRO might stop the payer from driving or travelling outside of Canada by invalidating his driver's license or Passport for non-payment.

Some other reasons why recipients may not receive their support on time include: The employer deducted the payment but had not yet sent it to the FRO; the employer only has to deduct and remit support payments according to its payroll schedule, not your children's feeding schedule; payments sent to the wrong address; payments sent with the wrong case number or misspelled name; direct deposit info for the recipient's bank is invalid; the welfare office takes payments due to the recipient; or money is owed to the FRO because earlier cheques went NSF ("bounced.") Once payment is received by the FRO it is supposed to be sent to the support recipient within 24-48 hours.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy New Year.

Add enough cold water to just cover the ingredients. They shouldn't slog around in excess water. Gently stir ingredients. Cover the pot and place it on a medium-high flame until the water simmers. Reduce to the lowest possible flame. Let cholent simmer for 6 to 8 hours, or longer if you've got the time, until the gravy thickens. For safety sake, do not leave cholent pot unattended.

Add salt to taste. However, for the erev Yom Kippur meal, use salt sparingly so as not to cause thirst and undue comfort during the fast. Serve over rice in large soup bowls. Garnish with parsley, if using. Yield: 8 servings.

CHICKEN TAGINE (Moroccan Style)

8 skinless chicken thighs
4 white potatoes
1 large onion, chopped
1/2 tsp. fresh ginger root, skinned and chopped
1 (28-oz.) can chopped tomatoes
1 (15.5 oz.) can chickpeas
2 or 3 zucchini, diced large
4 tomatoes, chopped
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
salt to taste
8 tbsp. cilantro, minced, optional garnish

Equipment:
Use a large stockpot, preferably of the stick-resistant variety.

Preparation:

If not using a stick-resistant pot, spray its interior generously with no-stick vegetable spray. Rinse chicken under cold water and place in the pot.

Scrape skin from potatoes and cut each into 8 chunks. To the pot, add chicken, potatoes, onion, ginger, canned tomatoes, chickpeas, zucchini, chopped tomatoes, cumin and cinnamon.

Add enough cold water to just cover the ingredients, and proceed as with the chicken cholent above.

FOOL-PROOF RICE

3 tbsp. olive oil
2 cups of uncooked rice
4 1/4 cups water
salt to taste

Rice may quadruple in size while cooking, so select a large, deep pot. Heat oil inside the pot on a medium flame for 1-2 minutes. Pour the rice into the pot and stir until each grain of rice is lightly coated with oil.

Add salt and stir to combine. However, for the erev Yom Kippur meal, use salt sparingly so as not to cause thirst and undue discomfort during the fast.

Continue stirring until rice appears translucent, about 2 more minutes. Pour in water and stir again. Cover pot and drop heat to a low flame. Check rice's progress after 10 minutes. If it appears to be soaking up most of the water, add more water 1/4 cup at a time. Stir to combine and cover pot again.

In another 10 to 15 minutes, rice should have absorbed all the water and be ready to eat. Take it off the flame and let it rest for 1-2 minutes in a covered pot. Move immediately into a serving bowl. At the table, spoon rice into individual soup bowls and ladle cholent or tagine on top of it. Yield: 8 servings.

Sutton Group Admiral's record growth continues unabated

Sol Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations. The "R" word isn't in their vocabulary.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Broker of Record Murray Goldkind prides himself on his ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol Goldkind, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Music eases the way for palliative patients

By HEATHER SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — It's a cart that looks like no other. Deborah Salmon stacks her books of sheet music in its caddy compartments.

Drawers on one side hold small, egg-like percussion instruments. The other side carries an ocean drum filled with ball bearings that make rushing, wave-like sounds; a tambourine and her flute.

A guitar rides on the front of the cart like a figurehead on a ship, as she pushes the whole contraption down the hallway of the Montreal General Hospital's 10th-floor palliative care unit.

When she stops outside a room, Salmon thoughtfully selects what she feels her patient might enjoy, along with percussion instruments if she or he is able to use them, and she knocks on the door.

It is her job to help alleviate her patients' anxiety, help them cope with their situation, improve their well-being and even regulate their breathing and heart rate.

"I might improvise music in rhythm with their breathing and, if it is quick, slow it down," says the music therapist.

Salmon has been making music for end-of-life patients for 26 years, starting at Montreal's Royal Victoria Hospital where, in the 1960s, Dr. Balfour Mount founded palliative care in North America. When the unit moved to the Montreal General Hospital seven years ago, she followed.

Music has always been her life. Salmon took up piano at age five; the flute in the Wagar High School band and guitar at camp. She pursued the flute seriously at the Conservatoire de musique du Québec à Montréal, where she first met someone who told her about music therapy.

After earning her bachelor of music degree in performance from the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg, she realized she "didn't like to be alone in a practice room for hours. I missed being with people. I decided to go into music therapy at New York University.

"I wanted the satisfaction of interacting with people who have the emotional and intellectual capacity for insight, able to work with what the music brings up. When this job came along in Montreal, it was perfect."

Salmon will sit at a patient's bedside and ask for requests. She has music for Jewish, Italian, Chinese and various other tastes and encourages family sing-alongs.

Spiritual songs are popular as are tunes from the 1940s and '50s, and timeless classical music. Every patient also has a CD player at her or his bedside and access to a CD library.

Salmon can create an audio CD of the patient talking, improvising music or presenting favourite songs. "They may also want to leave a message for their children or tell the story of their life for their grandchildren, interspersed with music," she says.

Salmon's husband, documentary filmmaker Garry Beitel, has twice involved her in his own projects. She is featured in On Wings of Song, a 43-minute film made in 1999, showing how Salmon works her musical magic. Endnotes, a 51-minute film made for the CBC, is about the palliative unit at the Royal Vic. Excerpts can be seen at http://reframe-films.com/films.html.

"Rather than focusing on the patients' difficulties, I look at what has been precious and meaningful in their life, and music can help take them there. It also stimulates feelings and discussions," she says.

Salmon is prepared both for music and discussion, since she also has a private practice as a psychotherapist at the Queen Elizabeth Health Complex. She has written scholarly articles and will lecture at a conference in Luxembourg in November.

Qualifications aside, she is able to connect immediately with the patients at the Montreal General Hospital with her gentle manner and the exquisite, soothing sounds she produces on her flute. One exercise Salmon does with them is to help them think of a happy place and, through music, transport them.

She also encourages them to compose their own pieces of music. One woman with ALS, a former musician, picked out a tune using a pointer attached to a headband. Then Salmon played it back fluidly.

Pure joy lit up the woman's face, as she realized her creative productivity was still intact.

Salmon's music follows through on the one-month and one-year anniversaries after a patient's passing, when she plays for her or his memorial service at the hospital.

"The average patient's stay in the unit is 10 days. When it's a young person in their 20s or a mother with young kids, it's hard for all the staff," says Salmon. "The work can be very sad, but it can be a lot of fun because there's music. We're playing music."

Geriatrician helps families do the right thing

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Michael Gordon, medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and a CJN columnist, wants to help adult children do the right thing for their parents who are in the later stages of life.

In his new book, Moments that Matter: Cases in Ethical Eldercare, Gordon uses case histories to provide an ethical framework that family members can use when deciding what is best for their elderly parents.

"A family has to arrive at a place where they can feel at peace with the decisions they've made, and know that those decisions reflect what the parent would have wanted or are in their best interests," said Gordon, who is also a clinical ethicist and professor of medicine at the University of Toronto.

A geriatrician for 36 years, Gordon, whose own father is 98 years old, said he is often asked to get involved with issues that could cause conflict. "I've gotten a wide perspective on what kind of ethical challenges families have to face. It may be the children or spouse of a patient, but certain themes come up again and again."

When families struggle with a decision, he said, "they tell me that they want to do the right thing. When it is all over, they want to be able to live [with their decision.]"

Driving is one of the issues he hears about often, he said. "Most people do not think about the ethics of driving, [but] potential harm to themselves and others overrides personal benefit and convenience."

He has had to recommend that a patient's licence be taken away, he said, "and I'm often challenged about 'why I'm doing this to them.' Like in other public health issues such as the mandatory reporting of certain contagious diseases, society has established the priorities to the public rather than the individual. Safe driving is no different."

It can be especially difficult for family members to report driving problems to the doctor, he said, "but a review of the financial benefits of giving up one's driver's licence and car, and using taxis instead may have some effect on the person."

The matter of driving, he said, is often a prologue to a sequence of challenging decisions.

An often difficult decision is about the best place for an elderly parent to live, Gordon said. "It is not uncommon for a parent to reject help that is suggested by even the closest, most loving children."

He said that one case he dealt with involved a physician's parents who were declining. "The father's problems were primarily physical, for which a great deal of assistance was required for dressing and bathing.

"His wife was developing progressive dementia and refused all help in the home, and would not consider moving."

It was only when the wife fell and required hospitalization, said Gordon, that the husband was admitted as an urgent respite case to a retirement home for a short term while the wife recovered.

He said that when it became clear that the wife needed permanent long-term care, the husband joined her at the same facility.

"Repeated offers of help sometimes change the person's acceptance of what is required, [but] on occasion you can only wait for a crisis to occur, which forces a care situation that resolves the problem for the parent."

Gordon said that one of the most "difficult conundrums you and members of your family might face is what might be perceived as life-maintaining treatment.

"One way around the terrible guilt [of making such a decision] is to decide before initiating such treatment, whenever possible, the framework by which the treatment will be discontinued."

Gordon said he attributes much of his interest in geriatrics to growing up with his grandmother in Brooklyn, N.Y. "She had a profound influence on my life. My deep affection for seniors is due to her impact.

"I always want to hear their stories. I can make a connection with them within a few minutes. I believe in people's stories. It makes them who they are."

Iran stages anti-Israel rallies amid peace talks

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Egypt has cancelled a visit by Iran's foreign minister to protest comments in which he accused Arab leaders of betrayal for attending the new round of Mideast peace talks in Washington.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki had been scheduled to visit Cairo this week for a meeting of Nonaligned Movement members.

Iran has an uneasy relationship with U.S.-allied Arab nations, which have watched Tehran's growing influence in the Middle East with concern because of suspicions over its nuclear program and its support for radical Islamic groups like Hamas and Hezbollah.

Mottaki said Arab leaders who attended the relaunch of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks in Washington this week were "betraying their nations."

"Some leaders... who follow America's orders must understand that they are betraying their nations," Iran's Fars news agency quoted him as saying on Tuesday.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordanian King Abdullah II attended the talks.

Egypt's Foreign Ministry said it summoned Iran's charge d'affaires in Cairo to notify him it was cancelling this week's visit and postponing the Nonaligned meeting.

Iran severed ties with Egypt after it signed a peace deal with Israel in 1979 and provided asylum to Iran's deposed Shah Mohammad Reza Pahlavi.

Iran called last week on all Iranians to attend nationwide anti-Israeli rallies as direct peace talks between Israelis and Palestinians were launched in Washington.

The late supreme leader of the 1979 Islamic Revolution, grand ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, declared the last Friday of the fasting month of Ramadan as Quds (Jerusalem) Day and called for mass rallies against Israel and in support of the Palestinians.

The rallies this year, which were to be held last Friday, coincided with the first direct Middle East peace talks in almost two years, held in Washington, where U.S. President Barack Obama was hosting Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad predicted the talks in Washington would once again fail, because the main demand of the Palestinian people – an end to the Israeli occupation – was once again not being considered.

Iran doesn't recognize Israel's sovereignty and says the only pragmatic option to resolve the Mideast conflict would be a referendum for all Palestinians, including the millions of refugees, to determine their fate.

Suspect arrested in L.A.

JTA

LOS ANGELES — Los Angeles police have arrested a suspect in the shooting deaths of three members of the city's Iranian Jewish community.

Harold Yong Park, 31, of Los Angeles, was in possession of several pounds of marijuana when he was arrested last week, according to the Sacramento Bee.

Investigators from the L.A. County Sheriff's Department believe that Park stole the marijuana from Pirooz Moussazadeh, 27, and his brother, Shahriar Moussazadeh, 38, and Bernard Khalili, 27, who were shot on the night of Aug. 25 at the brothers' apartment.

Park was arrested during a traffic stop near West Hollywood and booked for possession of marijuana for sale. After interviews with detectives, he was booked for murder and ordered held without bail, according to the Bee.

"Our community is shocked by the needless murder of three members of the Iranian Jewish community," Pooya Dayanim, president of the Iranian Jewish Public Affairs Committee, told the Beverly Hills Courier.

The men all moved to the United States as young children, Dayanim told the Associated Press.

They were not wealthy and had no criminal pasts, he added.

This could be you this winter....

Four killed, two wounded

Two Israelis were wounded in a West Bank shooting attack Sept. 1, a day after four Israelis were killed in a similar attack. The attack on an Israeli car occurred at the Rimonim Junction east of Ramallah. The couple, in their 30s, was able to get out of the car and hide in a ditch, according to reports. Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack and said it would continue its "operations of resistance," Reuters reported. Hamas' armed wing also claimed responsibility for the Aug. 31 shooting attack. Earlier on Sept. 1, hundreds attended the funerals of the four Israelis killed the previous day by a Palestinian faction reportedly trying to scuttle the start of peace talks. Yitzhak Ames, 47, and his wife Tali, 45; Kochava Even-Haim, 37, and Avishai Schindler, 24, all from Beit Hagai in the southern Hebron Hills, were buried on Sept. 1. The Ames couple were the parents of six children ranging in age from 1-1/2 to 19. Even-Haim had an eight-year-old daughter. Palestinian Authority security forces arrested more than 200 Hamas-affiliated suspects in the Hebron area in connection with the shootings. PA President Mahmoud Abbas condemned "all acts that target Palestinian and Israeli civilians," adding that the attack was meant to "disrupt the peace process and can't be regarded as an act of resistance."

NBA players visit Peres

Ten past and present NBA players visited Israeli President Shimon Peres at his Jerusalem office last week. The visit by the hoopsters, under the auspices of the America Israel Public Affairs Committee, generated much excitement in the halls of the President's Residence, with staff members vying to take photos with the players. "We're here to stand in support of Israel," Allan Houston, a former star with the New York Knicks and now in the team's front office, told Peres. Omri Casspi of the Sacramento Kings, the first Israeli to play in the National Basketball Association, was part of the delegation. AIPAC brought the players to Israel to educate them about the U.S.-Israel relationship, since they are influential with the American public, an AIPAC official told the Jerusalem Post. Other delegation members included Jerome Williams, David Wood and Dwight Howard Sr., the father of Orlando Magic all-star Dwight Howard, as well as Memphis Grizzlies general manager Chris Wallace.

Anti-Semitism conference set for next month

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The first-ever conference on contemporary Muslim anti-Semitism will be held in New York City next month.

Set to take place at the Doubletree Hotel on Oct. 2 and 3, it is sponsored by, among others, the Middle East Forum and a newly founded publication, The Journal for the Study of Antisemitism.

Steven Baum

Steven Baum, the journal's co-editor and author of forthcoming book, Anti-Semitism Explained, described it as "the first conference of its kind with top scholars on the subject from around the world."

Among the participants will be Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a Somali writer and lecturer who has denounced Islamic radicalism; Bruce Bawer, the author of Surrender: Appeasing Islam, Sacrificing Freedom and Daniel Pipes, the director of the Middle East Forum.

The topics to be discussed run the gamut from Jews and Islam to jihad on the university campus.

Baum said the scholars in attendance share a belief that anti-Semitism is "a social pathology that must be eradicated."

Calling Muslim anti-Semitism "a very serious problem," he claimed that most of the anti-Semitic attacks recorded in Canada last year by B'nai Brith Canada were "Islamist-based."

Some occurred at York University and the University of Toronto, he noted.

Saying that anti-Semitic attacks are on the rise globally, Baum said they tend to increase when Israel launches a military operation.

He claims that the media devotes little attention to anti-Semitism.

"No one wants to hear about it as long as the plight of the Palestinians is on the map," he said in an interview. "The media does not have the capacity for too many morality tales."

If the media really paid attention to anti-Semitism, the massacres in Darfur would take precedence over "Israeli misdeeds" in BBC coverage, he added.

Baum, a United States-based psychologist who grew up in Windsor, Ont. and completed his internship at Sunnybrook Hospital, said he and co-editor Neal Rosenberg conceived The Journal for the Study of Antisemitism after a mainstream British magazine rejected an article on Muslim anti-Semitism he had submitted.

Aussie Jewish leaders sever ties with paper

JTA

SYDNEY, Australia — Jewish leaders in Melbourne have severed ties with the city's major broadsheet newspaper over its treatment of Israel.

Jewish Community Council of Victoria president John Searle and Zionist Council of Victoria president Dr. Danny Lamm issued a joint statement late last month accusing The Age newspaper of pursuing a continued "war of words against Israel" and a "clear and consistent vilification of the world's only Jewish state."

The leaders of Victoria's major Jewish bodies said they had addressed the newspaper's "strident line" against Israel on several occasions with Paul Ramadge, the editor-in-chief, but to no avail.

But in an e-mail Aug. 24, Ramadge said because of the complexities of the Middle East conflict, his paper would never be able to report "in a way that pleases both sides all of the time."

While Searle and Lamm said there was no one incident that triggered the severing of ties at this time, the paper's coverage of a Turkish-flagged ship's attempt to break the blockade of Gaza in late May was the final straw.

The newspaper had a correspondent and photographer aboard the flotilla when the Israeli Navy intercepted it on May 31, leading to the deaths of nine Turkish passengers. A subsequent front-page article in The Age said the Israeli naval commandos "hunted like hyenas" before "tightening the noose" – language described by the Jewish organizations as "incendiary."

Ramadge said his staff "reported what happened accurately, fairly and to the best of their abilities."

Searle and Lamm said the problem dated back to Ramadge's predecessor, Andrew Jaspan, adding that The Age's alleged bias also had the "hopefully unintended by-product of legitimizing anti-Semitism in this country."

"We believe that The Age's record speaks for itself," they said. "Quite simply The Age is not a friend of our community."

Jews circumspect about Sarkozy's crackdown

By DEVORAH LAUTER
JTA

PARIS — With a preponderance of voices from the international media, human rights groups, the French clergy and some politicians denouncing French President Nicolas Sarkozy for fuelling negative ethnic stereotypes with his new immigrant-focused security crackdown, many Jewish community representatives in France are taking a more measured stance.

In July, Sarkozy launched some security-related initiatives that included a proposal stripping French nationality from foreign-born individuals who attack police officers and starting a program to rapidly deport Roma – or Gypsy – migrants to Romania and Bulgaria. The French leader also is dismantling hundreds of illegal Roma homes in shantytowns in France.

French President Nicolas Sarkozy

Sarkozy says the government is merely upholding French and European law, not "stigmatizing." But critics say Sarkozy is pitting communities against one another and violating the French constitution. Some have gone so far as to compare Sarkozy's policies with the Nazis' treatment of the Jews, calling it a tactic for gaining support from the far-right National Front Party.

Jewish community organizational leaders have tried to take a more diplomatic course regarding the controversial policies of a president who, as interior minister during a wave of anti-Semitism in France in 2002-04, took a hard line against those who posed a security risk to French Jews.

At first the community leaders sat out what has evolved into a major political storm for the government. Now some are responding, but their divergent responses reflect the divisions among French Jews about the efficacy of Sarkozy's proposals.

France's main Jewish umbrella group, the CRIF, has not put out any statement on Sarkozy's new policies. But in an interview with JTA, CRIF president Richard Prasquier said he supports the idea of expelling illegal Roma from the country and that the idea of denaturalizing certain foreign-born criminals is "understandable" if they are guilty of attacking officers.

Prasquier warned, however, against allowing prejudice to develop against Roma migrants who are French citizens.

"When we become French citizens, it must be merited," he said.

In explaining Jewish reticence to weigh in on the matter, Marc Knobel, the editor of CRIF's newsletter, said that "Jewish institutions are generally more discreet when handling questions that mostly concern the French."

The tepid reaction from Jewish officialdom has upset some Jews here.

"I think it's the role of the Jewish community to be heard," said Patrick Klugman, a member of the CRIF director's committee and co-founder of JCall, a European-wide group that supports pressuring Israel into cutting a two-state deal with the Palestinians.

Jewish leaders traditionally were "reminders of the principles of equality," Klugman said. Now, "I notice that almost all of French society has criticized Sarkozy, except the Jewish community."

Catholic leaders have not been silent as Sarkozy has dismantled Roma shantytowns and deported Roma.

With Sarkozy's security program, "an unhealthy climate has developed in our country," André Vingt-Trois, the archbishop of Paris, told French radio last week.

One Catholic priest returned his national medal of honour to protest Sarkozy's policies.

The European Commission against Racism and Intolerance said it's "deeply concerned" about the treatment of Roma in France and warned that Sarkozy's "government has taken action stigmatizing Roma migrants" who "are held collectively responsible for criminal offences."

"Government policies or legislative proposals that are grounded in discrimination on ethnic grounds are impermissible and run counter to legal obligations binding on all Council of Europe member States," the commission said in a statement.

France's chief rabbi, Gilles Bernheim, was more circumspect.

"This affair is not easy," he said. "It requires both moderation and firmness."

While Rabbi Bernheim said he hoped decisions on security "are made case by case, and that we never stigmatize a community," he also voiced support for Sarkozy's tough-cop proposals.

"I haven't forgotten that there's a real war that has been established against the police, against the forces of order, and when I see the violence that is exercised against the representatives of public order, I tell myself that we also need firmness to react to that," he said.

Like Jewish officials, most official Muslim community representatives, traditionally reluctant to publicly comment on French policy that does not refer directly to their community, also have stayed quiet about Sarkozy's security plans.

The new security measures were announced following two separate incidents of violent skirmishes between youth, believed to be partly of immigrant origin, and the police, plus a case involving violence by some Roma migrants who appeared to be French citizens.

Sarkozy's new policy proposals include denaturalizing those who attack public officials if they had become French fewer than 10 years before committing the crime, and denying automatic citizenship to immigrant youth approaching the age of eligibility but who are "anchored" in criminal activity.

He is also dismantling Roma encampments that include people of Roma origin who are French citizens and has proposed legislation that will make it more difficult for deported Roma to return to France.

Roma have been subject to discrimination throughout Europe for decades, and hundreds of thousands were exterminated in Nazi death camps. Roma rights groups say Sarkozy's new policies paint them as criminals.

Alain Finkielkraut, a leading French Jewish intellectual, said the attacks against Sarkozy's policies are politically motivated and overreactions.

"I'm happy that for the moment the Jewish community has refused to give in to this critical rush of enthusiasm," he said, adding that the current media storm had "lost sight" of Sarkozy's intention: to curb crime.

Teacher suspended over Shoah lessons

JTA

PARIS — A French high school teacher was suspended for spending too much class time on the Holocaust.

History teacher Catherine Pederzoli, 58, was suspended for four months after inspectors reported that she spent too much time teaching the Holocaust and organizing school trips to former concentration camps in Poland and the Czech Republic.

The district's general inspection report for the Henri-Loritz public high school in the northeastern French town of Nancy said Pederzoli "lacked obligations for reserve, neutrality and secularism," and "exploited students" by "brainwashing." Her focus on the subject of the Holocaust and planning trips to concentration camps took time away from teaching other subjects, according to the report.

Pederzoli's lawyer, Christine Tadic, filed a complaint Tuesday to block the school district's decision, and told the French media her client is the victim of anti-Semitism.

"Isn't the fault this teacher committed is that she is Jewish?" Tadic told the French news agency AFP.

District authorities requested an inspection into Pederzoli's teaching practices following a protest by her students, who demanded that the number of people allowed to participate in school trips to concentration camps not be reduced as planned by school authorities, according to French reports.

The inspectors criticized Pederzoli in their report for using the word "Shoah" 14 times, "whereas the term that is both neutral and judicially sound, 'genocide,' was only mentioned twice, as if in passing." AFP obtained the report.

The school district for the towns of Nancy and Metz based their decision to suspend the teacher on the report, but claimed in a statement Tuesday that the suspension "had no relation to the subject of teaching history and the memory of the Shoah, to which national education is very attached."

Fashion graphic designer moonlights as an entertainment reporter in L.A.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Some five years ago, a Thornhill, Ont., native took a huge leap. Sheri Nadel, a fashion graphic designer, had been working for companies such as YM Inc., which owns Stitches and Urban Planet, and Fairweather, when she decided that she was up against a brick wall.

Sheri Nadel

"As a fashion person, you're like, 'Now what?' It's either New York or Los Angeles," said Nadel, 31, a graduate of Ryerson University's fashion and marketing program, where she learned to design prints and textiles for clothes. "I started applying to companies in New York, because L.A. was too far. I have family in New York."

While applying for jobs, Nadel went to a job fair, where she interviewed with everyone and anyone, including BCBG Max Azria, a clothing company whose global headquarters are located in Los Angeles.

"They said, 'We'll fly you in for an interview.' I went, and I got the job. They said, 'The job's yours if you're here in three weeks. I did not know one person in L.A.... I'm so close to my parents and my brother, it was hard," she said.

But Nadel knew that she had to take the risk.

"I said, 'Forget it. I'm just going to go... you live once. That's why you do it," she said.

Nadel designed prints for BCBG for about three years. Her job included tracking down the latest fashions in Paris, Hong Kong or Vegas.

"I shop the market, see what's hot. I'm shopping for my company," said Nadel, adding that she combines her natural fashion instincts with research and foreign shopping to stay on top of current styles.

Nadel eventually left BCBG to work for a private label, where she's a fashion graphic designer/stylist.

But fashion wasn't enough for the Canadian. Since childhood, Nadel had been interested in acting. In high school, Nadel studied theatre and dance, making sure to participate in any school fashion show she could.

"I wanted to go to acting school, but my Jewish mother was like, 'You need a backup degree.'"

So Nadel did acting on the side, auditioning for roles in Los Angeles whenever she could. Every now and then, the auditions would pay off. Nadel has had roles in Relic Hunter, Style by Jury and Electric Circus, in which she was a dancer. But, as the designer learned in Los Angeles, nothing pays off more than networking.

"You can be pretty smart, but if you're not good at networking, you'll have a hard time."

Nadel learned this at a fashion show, where she noticed a few entertainment reporters and started up a conversation with one. At the end of the conversation, she got a business card for Real TV Films, an entertainment company that posts celebrity interviews online. Eventually, Nadel sent the organization a demo reel and was asked to come in for a group entertainment-reporter audition.

"I did about five interviews live on camera... the first time, it's nerve-racking," she said. But Nadel got past her nerves.

"I [thought], 'I'll just be myself. I'll talk to these people like they're my friends," she said of the celebrities she interviewed.

And it paid off. Right now, Nadel works as a fashion graphics designer by day and a freelance entertainment reporter/host for Real TV Films at night. She's interviewed Sylvester Stallone, Adrien Brody, Vivica A. Fox and Eric Roberts. Some of them have been a little intimidating.

Sheri Nadel, a freelance entertainment reporter, recently covered an event for Fox News 11.

"We've been to the big red carpets and interviewed the big A-listers. It can be nerve-racking... Some are friendly, some aren't. You have to know how to break them down," she said.

Nadel has to walk a fine line while interviewing celebrities.

"You have to watch what you ask...[but] as a reporter, I'd like to say I'm in control. It's my job to redirect them. They're the star, but you have to know where to cut them [off]," she said.

One of Nadel's most difficult experiences on the red carpet happened when she interviewed Samuel L. Jackson.

"I prepared for him, I looked him up on IMDB," she said. "He comes rolling down the carpet, he seems talkative, but when I tried to break the ice, I got one-word answers. I'm thinking, 'Oh my God, you're on camera. There's press everywhere.' You have to be quick. I'm like, 'I gotta make this guy laugh.'"

So, thinking on her feet, Nadel reached for an easy question.

"[I thought] we're two people, let's just talk... I asked, 'Who are you wearing?' He's like, 'Who are you wearing?' I said, 'Speechless [a fashion label] because I like to make people speechless.'" And he laughed.

"He was really cool after that. He was a hard one to crack," Nadel said.

Through her Hollywood connections, Nadel has walked red carpets as a guest, been to magician Harry Houdini's house and partied at the Playboy Mansion.

"I've been way too many times. Usually, if it's a big party, girls have to submit pictures of themselves – head shots and full body shots," she said.

Most recently, the entertainment reporter worked for Fox News, even though she only found out about the opportunity the day of the event.

"I got the call at 4:30. They said, 'We need you here in two hours.'"

This was a problem. Nadel was at work at the time, an hour away from the event.

"I had to make it happen. I drove an hour home, got ready and I was there 7 p.m. on the dot," she said. "Everyone came to me because I had the Fox News mike in my hand."

Tales of mystery and imagination

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Sylvia Maultash Warsh, the author of three mystery novels, now deftly turns her pen to a literary novel about a student in Toronto researching her thesis on E.J. Pratt's epic poem Brébeuf and His Brethren.

Although The Queen of Unforgetting is not a whodunit as her previous acclaimed works are – she has won an Edgar Allen Poe Award – in a way, The Queen of Unforgetting is still a mystery novel, exploring secrets that lie buried in the murky waters of the protaganist's past.

The novel begins with Mel Montrose nervously approaching the University of Toronto office of famed literary critic Northrop Frye to see if he would be her thesis adviser. With his assent, Mel then decides to spend the summer working at the reconstructed fort at Sainte-Marie Among the Hurons in order to research the life of the Jesuit missionary Jean de Brébeuf..

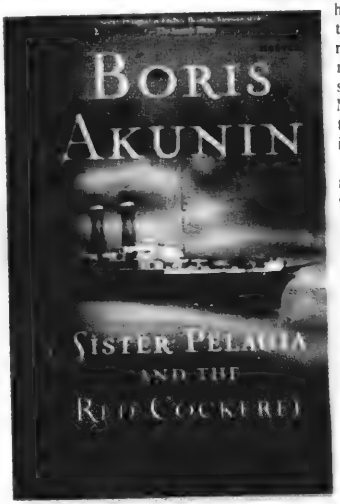
But Mel brings a lot more baggage with her than her typewriter and scholarly notes. The fort is located close to her hometown of Midland, Ont., where her parents, whom she's been estranged from, still live. And she's being stalked by fellow student Hugh, whom she briefly dated. Hugh has become obsessed with her and threatens to reveal a secret about her that could destroy her academic career.

At first things go well. She rents a room at a house away from her parent's neighbourhood. She enjoys her work as a tour guide at the fort and has plenty of time to work on her thesis outline. She also finds herself the object of attention of Jonathan, a tall, handsome man who's playing the role of Brébeuf in a historical play being put on at the fort.

But to her dismay, Hugh follows her to Midland and finds out where she's boarding. Mel is forced to take refuge at her parents' home, where we find out Mel is really Malka Rosenberg, the daughter of two Holocaust survivors from Poland.

When she brings Jonathan home, her father says he reminds him of someone he knew in the war. When Jonathan presses, her father begins to reveal Holocaust stories Mel never heard before. Like her, both her parents have long-repressed secrets and guilt buried in their past.

There is another narrative in this book. Occasionally, Mel puts aside her thesis to write her own version of the Brébeuf tale. Much of the historical evidence that exists from this period is based on the letters the Jesuits sent back to France. These letters don't tell the whole truth, since they were written with a positive spin so the people back home would continue their financial and moral support of the mission. As a diversion from her thesis, Mel decides to rewrite the story the way she imagines it happened.



Her tale of the missionaries, who were known as Black Robes, their hardships and eventual martyrdom deep in Huron territory is described in full grisly detail and is an interesting side plot. The massacre of the Hurons at the hands of the Iroquois neatly parallels the destruction of the Jews in Warsaw.

As a literary novel, and one about an English graduate student, this book is full of obvious literary devices including symbolism, foreshadowing, mixed metaphors, water imagery and pathetic fallacy. An English teacher's wet dream.

The Queen of Unforgetting (Cormorant Books) is a well-told story that reveals its secrets slowly, with everything coming to a head in a fast-paced climactic, bloody and, of course, highly symbolic ending.

Boris Akunin is the pen name of Grigory Chkhartishvili, a popular writer from the Republic of Georgia, the son of a Jewish mother. He's written dozens of novels in Russian, some of which have been translated into English.

Akunin is primarily known for his classic-style mystery novels that take place in late 19th-century Russia. Imagine Dostoevsky writing Agatha Christie novels. There are currently two series of books translated – the Fandorin mysteries and the Sister Pelagia books. Although Judaism is hinted at on occasion in some of these books, Israel and Judaism play a major role in the last of three Sister Pelagia books, Sister Pelagia and the Red Cockerel (Random House).

Sister Pelagia is a Russian Orthodox nun with a penchant for solving crimes, often in disguise and with a pair of deadly knitting needles hidden beneath her clothes.

In The Red Cockerel, a Russian Messianic figure is murdered on a boat to Jerusalem. Sister Pelagia's trail of a strange cult that converts Russian Orthodox worshippers to Judaism takes her to Palestine, where she travels the length and breadth of the Holy Land.

From Russia, she sails to the Port of Jaffa and then rides on to Gaza. From there she hires a coach to take her across the Judean desert to Sodom, where a bizarre Zionist cult has set up a colony and finally on to Jerusalem and the climax at the Mount of Olives.

Russian nationalist anti-Semitic groups are featured prominently in the plot.

Sister Pelagia and the Red Cockerel is a funny, clever mystery novel written in 19th-century Russian style. Akunin's fiction will appeal to lovers of Russian literature as well as those who enjoy mystery novels.

Humour first, magic second for Toronto magician

Jason Palter

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

At a time when the economy is at a low point, entertainment is especially important, says magician Jason Palter.

"My feeling is that it's especially in these times that you don't want to skimp on these entertainments," says the award-winning performer, who prides himself on his ability to make people laugh in addition to "mystifying" them with his tricks.

"I'm a firm believer that anybody could do the trick," he says, but not everybody can pick up the microphone and make people have a good time.

"Even if you figure out everything I did, my first response will be, 'Well, did you have fun? Did you laugh?'" he says. "Most magicians baffle first, entertain second, but I think entertain first and mystify second."

He started a business called Mystivate, a combination of mystify and motivate, which essentially defines his company's goals.

"They're being mystified while they're being motivated, so they're being mystivated," he says, with much enthusiasm coming through in his voice.

He performs for private events, as well as corporate gatherings, product launches, trade shows and anything else that involves entertainment. He stresses the importance of providing good entertainment.

"The next week, people are not talking about the food," he says. "They're talking about the entertainment, and they're talking about the speaker of wonderment."

Palter is a winner of the Canadian Event Industry Entertainer of the Year Award. He speaks energetically, seeming to get excited over everything he talks about. He says he absolutely loves his work and has much fun performing.

He recently performed at a fundraiser for Markham Stouffville Hospital and its expansion at the Markham Theatre. He says at one point, he had an audience member on stage whose comments made him laugh during his performance.

He says one of the things he loves about magic is the fact that it transcends language barriers because it's so visual.

"It doesn't matter which language you speak, that card you just picked has appeared in the deck, or those ropes that you just cut have reappeared," he says. "It doesn't matter what language it is, you're going to laugh."

These kinds of tricks spice up an event and seem quite unique for formal events. For example, he said at a wedding, he might chop the bride in half.

His magic ranges from close-up magic to stage magic, and he has also coached actors on how to do magic in their movies and television shows.He worked with Al Pacino in The Recruit and Alec Baldwin in Thomas the Magic Railroad.

With Baldwin, there wasn't enough time for the actor to master the trick, so it's actually Palter's hands in the movie doing the trick.

He credits his background in acting, as well as his major in radio and television at Ryerson University, as giving him a leg-up in the field because he understands what it takes to film a scene, since the lighting and camera angles create new challenges for making the trick look natural.

"Magic has to look like Harry Potter," he says. "Sure, he waves his wand, but it's supposed to happen, that it's a natural law. It just occurs, it's magic."

Palter became hooked on magic when he got his first magic set when he was nine years old. At 10 years old, he performed his first paid show – for $3.

"It was fun! I love the reaction, and I love the sense of wonderment," he says. Since then, he has continued to perform, and it has taken him through university, buying a house and paying his bills.

It's the comedy and entertainment aspect of a show that makes him stand out.

And in the end, magic is an art, and art is subjective, he says. "My style of doing the art is laughing, it's making someone laugh, and that's what I've always liked."

Widely travelled musician is comfortable on the road

By CARA STERN
CJN Intern

It took four years for Dave Borins to reach his 100th gig, but only a year and a half to play 150 more.

"I think I gained a lot of confidence that night," Borins, 27, says of his 100th performance, which took place at Hugh's Room in Toronto in January 2009.

He's done all of this, as well as released two albums. He said his do-it-yourself mentality can make recording and performing difficult but also really exciting. He's a big believer in working hard, and he has learned that he can choose what he wants to do, and that his decisions directly affect his life.

"If I put a lot of work into a project, it's going to turn out," he says.

He performed solo at Hugh's Room until his 100th concert, when a six-piece band joined him on stage, an addition that has continued at his Toronto shows since.

"Since [the 100th show], I've been on the road a lot, which has changed everything," he says. "If you sit on your ass at one place, you don't get anywhere."

And he's definitely not one to stay in one place. He's travelled to many countries – never to Europe, but to the less commonly travelled countries, such as Indonesia. As a child, he often travelled with his father, Mel, a family and holistic doctor, musician and travel writer.

"He loves travelling," Borins says of his father. "He took us to God-knows-where, anywhere that's not normal."

These experiences shaped him as a person in ways that are extremely beneficial to his career.

"It sculpted me in that I'm totally comfortable on the road and meeting new people," he says. "I try to book things with enough time to stop and check out [the area] or do a hike."

He loves to be outdoors and spends a lot of his time camping. When things are at a slower pace, he says, he can get much more thinking done. It also becomes easier for him to connect with people, including himself.

It's even better if he has to walk or paddle, he says, adding that it gives him a feeling of being very alive.

He spends a lot of time outdoors especially in the summer.

"I hate being in the city in the summer," he says. "All of the rough stuff going on, it's a drag, and I need to be by a lake or in the woods."

In addition to travelling, Borins' father influenced his songwriting. His father wrote music as a hobby and would routinely go to a studio to work on his music.

"That's how I learned a lot of folk songs and songs he'd play around a campfire," Borins says.

Additionally, his brother played guitar, so songwriting was never a foreign concept to his family.

Borins knew he could sing but had to learn enough about guitars to "catch up" to his singing skills.

"I don't consider myself a natural," he says. "I consider myself an absolute obsessive music fan."

He describes connecting with the Jewish idea of the wandering tribes, going hand in hand with the image of a wandering minstrel.

He also says it was the Jewish community that largely supported him at the start of his musical career, although he describes himself as more culturally Jewish than religiously Jewish.

Dave Borins

"I'm pretty well read in Jewish history and theology, just out of curiosity about knowing where I come from," he says, adding that he enjoys teaching others about Judaism, particularly when he comes across people who have never met a Jew before.

He has taken his music across the country, touring and meeting friends all around, which has allowed him to create a network of musicians that he can call on when he's in their neck of the woods.

He has been through most of Canada's provinces, except Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and has found Newfoundland to be the most welcoming and musical place out of anywhere he's been to in Canada.

"The impression you get from the stereotypes really doesn't tell the whole story," he says, describing Newfoundland as an incredibly beautiful place with very friendly people.

"They know how to have a good time, and they don't get hung up on the negatives," he says.

In October, Borins will perform two concerts to be recorded for a live CD at Hugh's Room. Visit www.daveborins.com for more information.

Nazi war criminal TV series starts Sept. 13

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Since the defeat of Nazi tyranny in World War II, Nazi hunters have kept busy hunting down war criminals who eluded justice.

History Television's eight-part series on this perennially chilling topic, Nazi Hunters, starts Sept. 13 at 8 p.m.

Judging by the first two episodes, Nazi Hunters should keep viewers glued to their seats.

Each episode contains archival clips from wartime Europe, interviews with surviving pursuers and dramatizations to heighten the effect.

Episode one focuses on Herbert Cukurs, the so-called Hangman of Riga, who was supposedly instrumental in the murder of 30,000 Jews.

Cukurs was living quietly in Sao Paulo, Brazil, when the Mossad, Israel's intelligence agency, decided to apprehend and kill him.

The Mossad agent assigned to track him down was Anton Kuenzle, a German Jew whose parents were murdered during the Holocaust.

Kuenzle, who appears on screen in disguise, presented himself to Cukurs as a wealthy Austrian businessman and former Nazi party member and Wehrmacht veteran.

Insinuating himself into Cukurs' life by appealing to his greed, Kuenzle hooked him by enlisting him in an investment scheme in Brazil. Falling for the story, Cukurs invited Kuenzle to his house to inspect his gun collection.

After gaining Cukurs' trust, Kuenzle lured him to Uruguay, where a Mossad team was ready to spring into action. The events unfold in 1964 and 1965.

Episode two, to be broadcast on Sept. 20, zeroes in on the capture of Adolf Eichmann, one of the key cogs in the Nazi machinery of death.

Among his other "accomplishments," Eichmann was responsible for shipping hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews to Auschwitz in 1944.

Like Cukurs, Eichmann resided in South America, living in Argentina under the assumed name of Ricardo Klement and working in a Mercedes car plant.

Interestingly enough, a blind Jewish piano tuner who had dated his daughter "outed" Eichmann.

Having discovered Eichmann's address, the Mossad dispatched a team to Buenos Aires to bring him to Israel for a show trial.

Rafi Eitan, a seasoned Mossad operative, headed the team. Since Eichmann was a creature of habit, returning to his home by bus every night at the same hour, he was easy prey.

In May 1960, the Mossad agents activated their plan. After a brief struggle, Eichmann surrendered, saying he was resigned to his fate. Later, at a safe house, he admitted his real identity.

The special El Al plane due to fly him to Israel was delayed by a week, causing intense anxiety in the ranks of the agents. Finally they were able to fly him to Israel.

Like the first episode on Cukurs, the Eichmann segment is informative and well worth watching.

Being Erica character resonates with Toronto Jews

By RENEE GHERT-ZAND

A young woman with long auburn hair sits surrounded by friends and family in her mother's living room while holding a tiny baby on a pillow in her lap. She's the sandek at the brit of her cousin's son, having agreed to take on this honorary role – the one who holds the baby – to please her father, a Reform rabbi who is the mohel.

But just as her father is about to perform the circumcision, the young woman faints. Her father moves in just in time, grabbing the newborn before she falls to the ground.

Meet Erica Strange, a bright and attractive Jewish woman in her early 30s living in a hip neighbourhood in downtown Toronto and working in book publishing. Erica is the fictional, time-traveling, eponymous lead character played by Erin Karpluk in the hit series Being Erica, which begins its third season Sept. 22 on CBC Television.

With much of the character derived from the life experience of the show's creator and executive producer, Jana Sinyor, this fictional 30-something Toronto Jew is resonating with many young Canadian Jews who see in her something of themselves.

"Erica is Jewish like I'm Jewish. It's not in your face, but at the same time it's not just by the way," said Ramona Carmelly, a professional opera singer in Toronto. "You really feel her Jewishness, even though Being Erica is not a Jewish show."

But some Jewish viewers are irked by the Jewish portrayal of Erica. One, Torontonian Pearl Gropper Berman, said the laissez-faire way in which the show treats Erica's dating non-Jewish men and her sister's intermarriage is not representative of Canadian Jews.

"I believe the daughter of a Toronto rabbi would be more engaged in the Jewish community," Gropper Berman said. "Toronto's Jewish community is much more conservative, and the decision-making surrounding dating someone non-Jewish would be more prominent."

Regardless of how accurate a portrait Being Erica paints of the contemporary Canadian Jew, it gives the larger Canadian viewing public some idea of what it's like to be young and Jewish in Toronto, and that has inspired pride even among many of the show's Jewish critics.

Rabbi Erin Polonsky of Temple Sinai in Toronto said she watches Being Erica despite her disappointment with how the show handles certain Jewish topics.

Gropper Berman also admitted to liking the show despite its Jewish shortcomings.

"It's very cool to have a character on TV who is Jewish but also smart, pretty, complicated and funny," she said.

Sinyor, Erica's creator, said this was intentional. "I purposely make characters as specific as possible in every way in order for them to be universally appealing," Sinyor said.

Jana Sinyor

"Everyone comes from somewhere, and I chose to make Erica Jewish because that is where I come from and what I know best."

On the show, Erica deals with the ups and downs of romantic relationships, dramas with friends and lots of family mishegas. She sees a therapist who, rather than prescribing Prozac or employing standard psychoanalysis, uses time travel to treat Erica, sending her into the past, future and alternate realities to work through her issues.

Several episodes in the first two seasons of the show had heavy doses of Jewish culture, from one set on Yom Kippur to another that flashes back to Erica's bat mitzvah. The way Erica's Judaism is woven into her identity is typical of modern Canadian Jews, some fans say.

Moshe Saadon, a sound technician in the film and TV industry who also happens to be a cantor, is one of several religious advisers Sinyor has used to help her stage Jewish scenes and episodes.

Saadon arranged for his historic Beach Synagogue to serve as a location set, supplied religious items, and played a gabbai and a rabbi in two different episodes. In one, he officiated at the intermarriage of Erica's sister.

Saadon said he's impressed by the earnestness with which the show's actors take on the Jewish aspects of their portrayals. Jewish cast members have helped other actors with Hebrew pronunciations.

Sinyor emphasized that she is "not speaking for Jews as a whole," but she said the show purposely addresses Jewish issues, such as interfaith dating and opposition to circumcision.

In the brit episode, Erica tells her father in an emotional outburst, "It's awful! You're cutting a baby without anesthetic for no good reason. I don't get it! I should never have agreed to participate."

Sinyor counts herself among the small percentage of Toronto Jews who refused to have their sons circumcised.

Marci Stepak O'Connor, a Jew from Toronto now living in Montreal and married to a Catholic, says she's a fan because Erica isn't complacent about her Jewishness, or anything else in her life.

"Being Jewish means constantly questioning," she said.

Being Erica is distributed in the United States and 85 other countries through BBC Worldwide.

JEWS AND BASEBALL IS A NEW DOCUMENTARY FROM TORONTO-BASED FILM PRODUCER WILLIAM HECHTER

A new documentary by a Toronto-based film producer explores the connection between Jewish Americans (and at least one Canadian, Shawn Green) who have gone into professional baseball.

Soon after the idea for Jews and Baseball: An American Love Story came to Winnipeg-born, Toronto-based producer William Hechter, he had assembled his dream team, including director Peter Miller and narrator Dustin Hoffman. "Making this film was a thrill," Hechter said. "I was inspired from start to finish, and every day was like being at the seventh game of the world series."

More than a film about sports, it is a story of immigration, assimilation, bigotry, heroism, and the shattering of stereotypes as it highlights standout Jewish baseball players from the 1860s to the present. The documentary includes interviews with fans (including Ron Howard and Larry King), writers, executives and players such as Al Rosen, Kevin Youkilis, Green, Norm Sherry, Ron Blomberg, Bob Feller, Yogi Berra and Sandy Koufax. The film ends with a stunning rendition of Take Me Out To the Ball Game sung by Sophie Milman.

Jews and Baseball: An American Love Story opens in Toronto at the Cineplex Sheppard Grande on Oct. 1, and the same day at Montreal's Cineplex Odeon Cavendish Mall.

Paint Your Wagon*: The Civic Light-Opera Company presents Paint Your Wagon, the rarely produced Broadway musical about the California gold rush. The score by Lerner and Loewe includes They Call the Wind Mariah, Wand'rin' Star, I Talk to the Trees and I Still See Elisa – all of which were major songs on the hit parade of their day. The show features an orchestra and full cast headed by Eric Botosan. Fairview Library Theatre, Sept. 8 to 25. $25 for all performances. 416-755-1717. www.CivicLightOperaCompany.com

Camp for Children with Special Needs: One Summer at Camp Winston, a documentary produced and directed by Karen Shopsowitz, focuses on a Muskoka-area camp that accepts children with complex neurological disorders, including autism, Tourette syndrome, Asperger's syndrome and attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD). The film introduces us to the children and the staff who take care of them, some of whom struggle with disorders of their own. Their stories often intersect as campers learn to deal with one another, while the staff discover inner strengths they never realized they had. The doc premières on the Documentary Channel, Sept. 14, 6 and 9 p.m

Names in the News: Joseph Mapa, president and CEO of Mount Sinai Hospital since 2001, says that "humour, insight, provoked conversation, entertainment and a high-quality product" are key elements that persuaded him to accept the position of chair of Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre's board of directors.

Teatron's board includes its artistic director Ari Weisberg, as well as Rimma Mouzika, Arnie Zweig, Marty Mehr, Tamar Ehrlich, Lyon Wexler, Gilbert Sharpe and Kivi Shapiro. Teatron's upcoming season begins in November and features the comedy Kosher Lutherans, the romantic drama Hard Love and A Hamburger in a Pita, a comedy by Toronto playwright Nina Shenhav. www.teatrontheatre.com

Punk Jews do it differently

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Three New Yorkers want to introduce the world to Punk Jews. No, it's not a band name but a documentary series the producers hope to bring to TV.

So, what are Punk Jews? "They are Jews expressing their spirituality in unique unconventional ways," producer Evan Kleinman, 28, explains in a conference call. They challenge their identity and fly in the face of staid tradition, he adds.

To get a sense of who they profile, the Punk Jews trailer offers a glimpse into these creative Americans: Cholent is a weekly gathering held inside at a New York City synagogue, where a diverse group of Jews gather to sing, dance, rap, share art and have fun. Y-Love is a Puerto Rican-Jewish rap artist who mixes Torah lessons with anti-racist messages in his rhymes. Rivka Karasik is a 34-year-old mixed media artist known for blending tzitzits and mezuzot in her artwork. Levi Okunov is a former Chassid who uses Hebrew symbols and Jewish-inspired designs to create saucy women's clothing.

What Karasik and Okunov are doing may be considered sacrilegious in some Jewish circles, but Kleinman says these progressive artists are honouring Jewish symbols with their creativity – more of an ode than an insult.

"This is a new story that hasn't been told before," says Jesse Mann, 30, director of Punk Jews. "These are challenging ideas, but they're turning people onto Judaism."

Mann and Kleinman point out the series also breaks down stereotypes, and "builds bridges to form community," similar to Cholent's motivation in New York.

The series is broken up into 10 episodes, each profiling a unique Punk Jew. They recently raised $11,000 in a fundraiser to film another season, although they have to yet to find a home for the documentary.

"We'll get this on TV one way or another," says a determined Mann.

So far, the team has been looking around New York for their next round of stories. They've entertained the idea of going up to Canada to find more Punk Jews, but for now they're sticking to their area code because they have a limited budget.

As their website indicates, the Punk Jews team is already filming the next few episodes. Profile subjects include "a yoga Jedi Jewish contortionist from space" and Rabbi Simcha Weinstein, known as the Comic Book Rabbi and the author of Up, Up and Oy Vey.

Attention Snowbirds

What happens to your Florida home or condo when you're not there? Have your Florida home checked on while you're away, prepared, and safe for your return visit.

Our service provides homeowners with peace-of-mind during extended stays away. We will:

- grocery shop for your arrival
- make sure property is secured after your departure
- clear out unwanted flyers and newspapers
- help rent out your property
- arrange home health care/bathroom safety rentals or sales of walkers, scooters, and wheelchairs

We offer property inspections inside and out, weekly or monthly. We act as an emergency contact in your absence. We help meet your insurance requirements for property visits.

Girls grab bronze in JCC Maccabi event

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There were plenty of tears and disappointment on the field in Baltimore as a close-knit team of girls saw their hopes for a soccer gold medal at the JCC Maccabi Games crushed in the last four minutes of overtime.

Despite being the tournament's top playoff seed, the under-16 Toronto girls allowed two late goals and relinquished a 2-1 lead to lose to Boca Raton, 3-2.

The loss, though heartbreaking, didn't completely deflate the girls. They went on to beat Baltimore Red 3-0 in the bronze medal game, said Alex Voihanski, Toronto delegation head. Boca Raton went on to win the gold medal, defeating a team from Virginia Beach in the title game.

The loss was hard to take, said Voihanski, particularly since the girls played so well in the round robin, defeating Boca Raton 5-2 in the opener, crushing Houston 6-1, tying Baltimore Red 2-2 and defeating Baltimore White 7-0.

Entering the playoff round against Boca, Toronto knew they were in for a tough match. Despite handling them easily in the opener, Boca was considered one of the top teams, and in the playoff, Boca jumped to a 1-0 lead. Toronto tied the game in the second half, and regular time ended in a 1-1 draw.

The teams played two halves of overtime before Toronto got the go-ahead goal with only about four-and-a-half minutes to play.

Soccer team loses in overtime

But "the girls let down and Boca Raton scored twice in the last four minutes," Voihanski said. Both were quality shots, neither were "cheap goals," he added.

"We lost one game in six. That lapse for three minutes cost us a gold," Voihanski said.

The team was led by the strong goaltending of Carly Galantz, who lives in St. Catharines, Ont., and by the team's leading scorer, Zoe Stein, who put 10 shots past opposition goalies.

Lauren Clarfield scored the winning goal in the bronze medal game.

Voihanski, who with partner Jeremy Blustein operates JCC Chai Sports and runs sports leagues for the Prosserman JCC, said "transition" issues and coming late to the project meant only one team was taken to the youth games. Future games should see greater Toronto participation, he added.

Confusion at the JCC was apparent last week when letters went out to families with children in the centre's sports programs saying the relationship with Voihanski and Blustein was being severed as of the end of August. Later, the Prosserman JCC said Voihanski and Blustein would continue to manage the centre's sports activities.

"Over the weekend, additional efforts were made by all parties, including some generous program sponsors, to assure that the excitement of JCC Chai Sports continues. We are pleased to let you know that Alex Voihanski and Jeremy Blustein will continue to manage JCC Chai Sports," stated a follow-up letter signed by Sherry Kulman, the Prosserman JCC's acting executive director.

"It's a healthy, happy relationship," said Voihanski. "There was a miscommunication. Someone jumped the gun on something that shouldn't have happened."

More than 1,000 youngsters and adults have participated in various JCC sports over the past year, including basketball, hockey, baseball and soccer, he added.

Favre's return consigns Rosenfels to sidelines – again

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — With the the 2010 National Football League season kicking off with a game on Thursday, Sept. 9, between Minnesota and New Orleans, Vikings' quarterback Sage Rosenfels must have shed more than a few tears when the soon to be 41-year-old icon Brent Favre made his annual dramatic but tardy entrance to training camp in mid-August.

The Jewish backup signal-caller probably knew when the Vikings lost their opportunity to reach the Super Bowl last year in a last-minute playoff loss that Favre's fear of retirement – plus a giant ego – would motivate him to return one more time.

Consequently, Rosenfels, 32, will automatically fall to second or third on the team's depth chart, where he will once again, clipboard in hand, patrol the Vikings' sidelines like a loyal scout wondering what might have been had the QB legend been a mere mortal.

Drafted out of Iowa State by the Redskins in the fourth round in 2001, Rosenfels lettered in football, basketball, baseball and tennis. He's already had stops in Washington, Miami and Houston. When he came to the Vikings, he had to give up his chai (18) number and was ironically given uniform number 2, which in itself speaks volumes since, he so often has missed out on being a starting signal-caller. As for his name, Sage, that's somewhat suitable, too, in that he is a member of the National Honor Society in football, having earned high marks in the classroom.

With the upcoming Super Bowl to be held in Cowboys Stadium in Arlington, Texas, on Feb. 6, a pair of Jewish stalwarts, both starters with Dallas, won't have to travel far if their team manages to make it to the final.

Defensive right end Igor Olshansky, the first Russian-born player in the NFL, previously played six seasons with the Chargers in San Diego. The 28-year-old, who stands 6-6 and tips the scales at 315 pounds, is in the second year of an $18-million (US) pact and earns every bit of it.

Last season, the onetime Oregon standout played in all 16 games and started 14. He's known as a blue-collar worker who flashes occasional bursts of pressure and is a steady run-stopper while shielding off blockers. Proud of his heritage, Olshansky sports two Star of David tattoos on his body.

An interesting thing happened to Olshansky last year in his inaugural training camp with the Cowboys, when he discovered another Jewish player, Kyle Kosier, an offensive left guard who hails from Arizona State and is now in his 10th year in the league and his fifth in Dallas.

Not unlike Olshansky, Kosier at 31, is a giant of a man at 6-5 and 307 pounds. He's described by observers as being rock solid, not terribly athletically gifted, but smart and dependable and a hard worker. He is one of those under-appreciated types, but it's been said that the offence struggles when Kosier isn't out there. Last year he started and played in all 16 games, and Dallas had a respectable record of 11-5.

In a specialty role, there is 17-year veteran long snapper David Binn, 38, who played at the University of California Berkeley, where he was also a linebacker. He is 6-3 and weighs 228 pounds, and because of his speed he can also cover on punts. The son of a Jewish father, he's the last remaining player from the San Diego Chargers' Super Bowl cast and is the team's all-time leader in career-games played.

Adam Podlesh, 27, is back as punter with the Jacksonville Jaguars and possesses a strong leg. The 5-11, 200-pounder played his college ball with the Terrapins at Maryland and appeared in all of his team's 16 games last year. His kicking average in 2009 was 41.9 yards, just below his four-year career average of 42.2.

Offensive left tackle Geoff Schwartz of the Carolina Panthers is a 6-6, 331-pound offensive left tackle who is only 24 and in his third year with the club. The Panthers drafted him in the seventh round in 2008. He's known to be nasty and works hard to finish his blocks. An all-round athlete, he excelled in baseball and basketball as well as football at the University of Oregon. A political science major, it has been said he could have chosen baseball as a career considering the number of scouts who followed him at the amateur level. Schwartz is rated second on the depth chart at his position with a team that has one of the top-rated offensive lines in the NFL.

Considering the fact that wide receiver Julian Edelman, 24, out of Kent State, was selected in the seventh round of the 2009 Draft, he was a real find for the New England Patriots. In his rookie season, he played in 11 games, starting in seven. Only 5-10, despite what the program might say, he's only 198 pounds. Julian appears more suited to the Canadian Football League. Nonetheless, in his rookie campaign, he latched on to 37 Tom Brady passes for 359 yards. He also caught a pair of TD strikes in the Patriots' 33-14 playoff loss to Baltimore. Interestingly, he was a three-year starter in college as a quarterback, where in his final year he suffered a broken arm.

In the rookie department, the San Francisco 49ers drafted Taylor Mays, a free safety from the University of California who is an African-American Jew. His dad is Stafford Mays, a one-time defensive lineman in the NFL, and mother Laurie Mays (nee Black) is a Nordstrom executive. Taylor made it big in college, where he won All-Pac10 honours twice and was also an All-American three times after a college career in which he played in 48 of 52 games. He was chosen as one of the top three finalists for the Jim Thorpe Award as the nation's best defensive back.

The Seattle-born player was raised Jewish and had a bar mitzvah. In his college yearbook, he commented on that significant event in his life. "I don't think at the time I really understood what it meant. Now that I am looking back on it, I feel like I have come a long way in regards to maturity and becoming an adult."

Hopefully he will go a long way, too, as a pro in the NFL.

APPLE GLAZED CHICKEN

2 whole chickens
1 6 oz can frozen apple juice concentrate, thawed
1/4 c packed brown sugar
1/4 c ketchup
1 tblsp cider vinegar
1 tsp thyme
1 clove crushed garlic
dash hot pepper
2 green apples, cored, cut into wedges
2 onions, peeled, cut into wedges

Preheat oven to 325° F Spray a large roasting pan with cooking spray. Lay chickens breast-side up. Combine remaining ingredients, except apples and onions. Brush half the sauce over chicken. Tuck onion and apple wedges around chicken. Bake, uncovered, 1 hr., 15 mins. Carefully turn chicken over; brush remaining sauce on chicken. Bake an additional hour, or until golden brown and juices run clear.

About Life

Dear Ella,

This past year has been a hard one. I lost my mother, who was also my best friend, after going through a rough period with my youngest son who was diagnosed with ADHD. My marriage has taken a big hit as well. We're not quite separated, but we might as well be. We are living like strangers in the same house.

I'm not a religious person at all, but I found myself praying to God on more than one occasion, seeking help to get through this. I actually went to the synagogue near my house last week and bought myself a High Holiday ticket. Now I feel like the biggest hypocrite. I'm struggling with all kinds of emotions and feeling a bit ridiculous. Did I think it would solve all my problems?

Turning to Faith

Dear Turning to Faith

Faith is a very individual concept. There's no right or wrong. There's only what's right for you as an individual. Some people are born into an observant lifestyle, and they practise their beliefs from Day 1. Others come to religion for different reasons, such as marriage, spiritual fulfilment, tradition, search for peace etc. Whatever the reason, it makes no difference. In your case, it may be the pursuit of hope. What you've been through is too much for you to handle on your own, so you're searching for help. Praying is a sort of meditation. It gives you the time and permission you need to think and dig down deep into your soul for answers, for peace and for strength. You're turning to religion to find that, as so many people do. There's no need to question your motives.

Rosh Hashanah is an excellent time to start being introspective. It's the "beginning," the start of a new year, as well as new thoughts, ideas and changes. It's a time to look back and see what we could have done differently and bring those positive changes with you into the future so that you can make a better life for you, your family and those around you.

Spirituality isn't ridiculous. It's a way of accessing your inner being. Don't fight it, I think it's a journey you won't be sorry you took.

I would like to wish all my readers a very happy and healthy New Year. L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu V'Taichatemu.

Play the 'bounce back' game

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

What do you do when you have a major setback in your life?

There are those who play the blame game and blame someone else for the fact that things are not turning out the way they wanted them to. People like this often spend their lives blaming others for their own misfortunes and mistakes instead of taking responsibility for their own life, Karen Salmansohn writes in The Bounce Back Book.

"I suggest that instead of becoming a member of the 'Blame Culture,' you sign up for membership in the 'We Bounced Back Impressively Culture,' and become one of those who really worked to overcome a major life setback," Salmansohn says.

There are people like Oprah Winfrey, Helen Keller and Lance Armstrong "who transformed their greatest challenges into their greatest triumphs, nobly and joyously inspiring others to strive for greater joy, peace and fulfilment," she says.

Taking personal responsibility for yourself is the only way to become a happy, healthy and well-adjusted person, and it's a wonderful example to set for your children.

When you don't accept personal responsibility, it can lead to chronic stress and unhappiness, Brian Naszaly writes in his weekly insights column on SixWise.com.

"Harbouring negative emotions and anger means you are living with chronic stress, the type that eats away at you little by little. Chronic stress is the type of stress that has been linked to fatigue, back pain, stomach upset and headaches, along with more serious illnesses such as heart disease, cancer, depression, autoimmune diseases and reproductive problems."

Signs that you are avoiding personal responsibility are that "you almost never believe you are wrong, you dwell a lot on the past instead of looking toward the future, you believe life is unfair and often feel sorry for yourself."

Actually, apologizing when you're wrong is a powerful way to show your inner strength.

Other ways to take the high road, Naszaly says, include: "learn to forgive, be open to the ideas and opinions of others, identify the things in your life you are not happy about and do something to change them. Practise saying, 'I am responsible,' and eventually you will start to believe it, adopt a positive outlook on life and recognize and embrace your own shortcomings, and the next time you're tempted to blame someone else, accept responsibility yourself. Then experience how much better you feel."

When you are dealing with a painful situation, try to not blame others, and instead, work on accepting the situation. This will help you get through your unhelpful preconceptions and find peace.

In the book Loving What Is, Byron Katie talks about how to turn your thought around and how to use four questions that can change your life. The questions, when applied to a specific problem, allow you to see what is bothering you in a different light.

"It's not the problem that causes our suffering, it's our thinking about the problem," Katie says. With these questions, you can undo much of the unnecessary suffering you create for yourself and find more happiness and peace.

Another great way to bounce back after one of life's setbacks, is to make a "to be" list instead of a "to do" list. What would that list look like for you?

Your assignment would be to make a list of adjectives that will help you be where you want to be. Words like kind, patient, direct, open-minded, forgiving, flexible, optimistic and brave might be some that will help you become the person you want to be.

Women you should know

Only a few readers, if any, will be able to identify all of the women whose portraits are above, especially since some of the portraits are renderings of an artist's imagination. But all of them are identified in the pages of this supplement.

All are women you should know.

All are women of strong character.

All are women of striking courage.

All are women of stirring heart.

All were inspired by a profound sense of who they were (or are still), as women, as Jews, as members of a wider humanity that is always and ever in need both of mending and affirming.

We have highlighted merely 15 women. We could have highlighted 1,500 or more. The group is far from being comprehensive. Nor does it adequately sweep across the wide panorama of Jewish history. Nor could it.

The women we have selected have left their marks in the worlds of arts, literature, academics, scholarship, politics, social action and communal life.

The starting point for our selections is Dona Gracia Nasi who lived 500 years ago. Her story is simply remarkable, a testament to the highest qualities in a human being that God seeks for us.

Above all and connecting all the women whose lives we feature was Dona Gracia's paramount, ever-present sense of belonging to the Jewish people and of committing herself to the values and purposes that are our people's intergenerational and forever heritage.

Our purpose in publishing the stories of the lives of these quite exceptional women is to bring to readers an awareness of a rich, resplendent history that some may not know.

Our hope, however, is that some of the stories at least may also inspire readers through an immutable knowledge that we are all connected.

Perhaps this is the most beautiful of all inspirations or lessons that these stories might impart.

Across the ages, in different times, on different continents, in different lands there will always be those among us, because of us, who act for the sake of their people and their world.

Readers interested in reading about other remarkable Jewish women are directed to the following superb sources.

• Jewish Women's Archive at http://jwa.org

• Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia, a CD-ROM originally published by Alice and Moshe Shalvi of Shalvi Publishing Ltd., and edited by professors Paula Hyman of Yale University and Dalia Ofer of Hebrew University of Jerusalem. For more information, visit http://jwa.org/encyclopedia/cdrom

I wish to express our thanks to professors Michael Brown, Sara Horowitz and Hindy Najman for assisting us in preparing the supplement.

Enjoy the supplement. Enjoy the holidays.

May these stories help make the holidays more meaningful.

EDITORIAL

From a secret to a fiercely proud Jew

[Dona Gracia Nasi]

Imagine a Jewish woman who, in 2010, is considered New York's wealthiest, most powerful and most influential person, to the point of being able to organize, almost single-handedly, the boycott of La Guardia Airport. She can also control the stocks, monopolize the software and hardware business and successfully engineer a huge underground network to save Jews in danger.

Hannah Mendes or, as she was more commonly known, Dona Gracia, was such a woman. Born Beatrice de Luna in Lisbon circa 1510, Dona Gracia married Francisco Mendes, head of the Mendes banking house, and a secret Jew like her, in 1528.

By Sarah Carlen

When Francisco died eight years later, he left her a huge fortune. In 1536 Lisbon was not safe for secret Jews. With her young daughter, sister and two nephews, Dona Gracia left Lisbon for Antwerp.

Antwerp was then the commercial and financial centre of northern Europe, where the spice trade, one of the family's specialties, proved to be such an enormous source of profit that European kings and queens often borrowed money from them.

Dona's sister, Brianda, married Diogo Mendes (Francisco's brother), known as the spice king of Europe. His wealth and social position made it easier for them to live as secret Jews in Antwerp. Diogo and Dona organized and maintained an underground network that allowed the Spanish and Portuguese Jews to leave their country and find a safe haven elsewhere.

When Diogo died in 1542, Dona had to manage one of Europe's "greatest fortunes and greatest businesses." Many nobles were now courting her daughter and Dona, not wanting her to marry a Christian, decided to move on.

She went to Venice, however she did not stay too long. The papal legate decided her daughter should be brought up in a nunnery and Dona was placed under arrest. Money bought her freedom but she decided to leave Venice and head for Ferrara. Here, she and her family openly reverted to Judaism and she was able to continue helping secret Jews escaping from Spain and Portugal.

She became known as Dona Gracia Nasi — Hannah to her family and friends — no longer a secret Jewess, but a fiercely proud one. In Ferrara, surrounded by the rich atmosphere of the Renaissance, Dona Gracia was able to indulge in her love for the arts. As well, she financially helped with the printing and publishing of Jewish writings, in particular the Ferrara Bible, which was dedicated to her.

She fed the poor and the hungry every day

With the founding of the Jesuit òrder in 1540 and the strengthening of the Inquisition, even Ferrara was no longer safe and Dona Gracia felt compelled to leave again. She did so in the summer of 1552 with her family and her huge staff, this time going to Turkey. Here the sultan, Bajazet II, welcomed all Jews, in particular rich and famous ones.

Dona Gracia continued to feed 80 to 100 poor people at her table every day, as she had started to do in Ferrara. She managed an overseas business in spices, wool, grain, cloth and textiles so huge that she had her own ships to carry the goods. There were branches of her business all over the Balkans and the Archipelago, in Ragusa (today Dubrovnik), Belgrade, Sarajevo, Naxos, Italy and France, especially Lyons.

In 1554, Joseph Nasi, her nephew, joined his family in Constantinople. From then on, nephew and aunt worked very closely together in all branches of Dona Gracia's business. Secure and powerful in Turkey, she now felt she had to keep a promise she made to her husband: to have him buried in the Holy Land. There are no details about this extraordinary and extremely dangerous enterprise, but she managed to have his remains exhumed from a churchyard in Lisbon and taken to the valley of Jeoshaphat in Jerusalem.

Dona Gracia controlled Jewish life in the Ottoman Empire, and even beyond, until her death. She is the only woman who did this in the history of the Diaspora.

She was known among the Jews of the time as La Senora, or Ha-Giveret, the lady. The most important of her activities, and by far the most dangerous, was the rescue of the Marranos, who continued to trickle out of Spain and Portugal and for whom she spared no effort or money.

Dona's charity knew no bounds. She built and maintained schools, hospitals and roads all over Turkey. She took care of needy Jews in Palestine and redeemed Jews enslaved by the Knights of Malta or kidnapped by pirates. In 1554, 1556 and 1561, epidemics of pestilence plagued the empire, and she generously opened her purse to help Jews and non-Jews.

Wishing our clients and friends a healthy, happy and prosperous New Year

Ridout & Maybee LLP

Celebrating 85 Years!

In 1925, our mothers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers formed a Zionist organization. Back then, they were Pioneer Women collecting money for Palestine. Now, in 2010, we are Na'amat Canada fundraising to maintain vital social services for women and children in Israel.

The names may have changed, but the mission remains the same. With your help, we can make a difference for generations to come.

Happy Rosh Hashanah from Na'amat Canada

'The heart of her people'

She founded a yeshiva in Constantinople, where, according to Sephardi tradition, half the time was devoted to religious study and the other half to secular subjects: at the time mainly mathematics, medicine, philosophy and astronomy.

She built synagogues wherever there was a need and interest. In Salonica she founded a Midrash (as it is called in Sephardi communities, as opposed to Bet-Midrash in Ashkenazi communities) and a talmudic academy in Tiberias.

Her work, devotion to her people, courage and faith were recorded by contemporaries such as Rabbi Moses di Trani, who paraphrased King Solomon's verse: "Many daughters have done virtuously, but Hannah has excelled them all."

The ex-Marrano chronicler, Immanuel Aboab, described her "excellent virtues and noble deeds, regarding which it would be possible to write many books." The physician Lusitanus wrote that she was "adorned by all the virtues." Rabbi Almosnino of Salonica called her "The Lady, crown of the glory of goodly women." Rabbi Soncino described her as "the crowned Lady, chaplet of grace of the hosts of Israel... who built the House of Israel with holiness and purity with her wealth and treasure."

The Portuguese poet-chronicler Samuel Usque summed up all these praises when he called her "the heart of her people," and described her in the following way:

"...who has seen revived the intrinsic piety of Myriam, offering her life to save her brethren? The great prudence of Deborah, in governing her people? That infinite virtue and great sanctity of Esther, in helping those who are persecuted? The much praised strength of the most chaste and magnanimous widow Judith, in delivering those hemmed in by travail?

Such has the Lord sent to you in these days from the most supreme rank of his armies, embodying them in a soul of His which, by high chance and your happy lot, is installed in the most proper womanly body of the fortunate Jewess Nasci...In brief, the wide pinions and outspread wings of this eagle have saved a great part of your sons in their flight from the cruelty of the Portuguese, so that she thus imitated the Lord at the time of the exodus from Egypt."

The power and influence of Dona Gracia are nowhere more evident than in the famous boycott of Ancona, a seaport in the Adriatic coast of Italy where the Inquisition organized a series of auto-da-fes during which 25 Jews were found guilty of heresy. They were strangled and burned in front of a jeering crowd.

She died before she realized her greatest dream

This pained and infuriated Dona Gracia tremendously. A woman of action, she decided to vindicate the murdered Jews in order to prove to the world that "all Israel are sureties the one for the other." With the consent of the Turkish sultan, she organized an international boycott of the port from which ships and cargoes were diverted to Venice, causing great risks not only to the Ancona traders but also to the traders from the papal states.

This showed uncanny vision for the time because she was able to go beyond the traditional response of the Jews which was "suffering in silence." Instead she demonstrated that they could and should improve their lot not just by bribing and praying, but by actually fighting on the economic and political fronts.

Unfortunately, two influential rabbis opposed the boycott on communal and religious grounds: first, the aging and insecure Rabbi Moses Bassola of Ancona and later on, Rabbi Joshua Soncino of Constantinople.

Dona Gracia was devastated. This terrible blow led her to leave for the Holy Land earlier than she had planned.

> 'Never perhaps in the whole of Jewish history... had a woman's death been so profoundly mourned'

She had a mini-palace built for her in Tiberias, where she intended to create an independent Jewish settlement thanks to the privileges that the Sultan had granted her in exchange for 1,000 ducats a year.

Unfortunately, she died before she realized what seemed to be her greatest dream: to reclaim the land of Israel for the Jews and to be buried besides her husband. We do not know where or when she died, the best guess being early summer of 1569.

At her passing, Jews all over the world mourned her. Elegies, poems and kinot were written and read in synagogues where memorial services were held.

Royalty in the Christian and Muslim worlds, Jewish communal leaders and scholars from all over the world, needy people who had shared food at her table and many others all felt the loss of this great woman.

As was written at the time: "Never perhaps in the whole of Jewish history, since the days of Salome Alexandra, the Hasmonean queen of Judea 16 centuries before, had a woman's death been so generally and so profoundly mourned. No other woman in Jewish history has been surrounded with such devotion. No other woman in Jewish history, it seems, has deserved it more."

Dona Gracia Nasi honoured in Israel

Let us continue to remember the heroism and triumph of Dona Gracia's extraordinary life.

A 'holy woman'

Jacket cover from They Called Her Rebbe, The Maiden of Ludomir by Gershon Winkler

[Maiden of Ludmir]

Even her name is uncertain. Today she is known as Hannah Rachel, but some records say Rachel Hannah or Haya Rachel. Her family name was Verbermakher, or Zilbermakher. She was the daughter of Monesh, or Zalman, a merchant or weaver, and a mother whose name has been forgotten. She was born in 1806 or 1815. She died in 1888 or in 1905 and is buried in Jerusalem, or Safed, or in her hometown in Ukraine, Volodymyr-Volynskyi, called in Yiddish Ludmir.

Through these veils of uncertainty, this holy woman is remembered because her courage and spirituality broke through all the limits and expectations of her society.

Jewish Eastern Europe was not devoid of spiritually powerful women. Many a grandmother knew how to give a blessing or remove an evil eye. There were wise women and women healers. There were women who led Yiddish prayers in the women's sections of their synagogues. There were women visionaries who could see secrets and foretell the future. From her youth, Hannah Rachel combined all these roles in her own powerful self.

By Justin Jaron Lewis

At the same time, Hannah Rachel conducted herself like a rebbe, a chassidic spiritual leader. To this day, this is a male role. Hannah Rachel was not the only chassidic woman to aspire to such heights.

A chapter in my book Imagining Holiness is devoted to her contemporary, Eydl of Brody, called Eydele the rebbe. She was known for her healing power and storytelling. There were only a handful of these women, however, and their lives were not easy. Eydl, according to one account, was subjected to an exorcism to drive out the possessing spirit that made her act as if she were a man.

While Eydl was the daughter of a great rebbe, Shalom of Belz, Hannah Rachel became a spiritual leader without any family ties to male rebbes. Even for a man, this was practically unheard of, and Hannah Rachel seems to be the only woman who ever attempted it.

Finally, unlike almost any Jewish woman in her time or any other, Hannah Rachel sought to live a celibate life, devoting herself not to a spouse and children but to God and a community of followers. It is this choice that gave her the titles by which she is remembered, the ambiguous di ludmirer moyd – the maiden, or the "old maid," of Ludmir, and the positive, though seemingly un-Jewish di heylike bsule: the holy virgin.

The definitive biography of Hannah Rachel is The Maiden of Ludmir: A Jewish Holy Woman and Her World (University of California Press, 2003), by Nathaniel Deutsch, a brilliant young scholar who devoted several years of his life to finding out everything possible about her.

Deutsch's compelling study is my source for this article. Here is the story of Hannah Rachel's unique path in life, pieced together from the often contradictory written and oral accounts and archival records gathered by Deutsch.

A great rebbe, Motl of Chernobyl, promised a child to a barren chassidic couple, and the blessing came true. The baby was not, as usual in such stories, a son, but a daughter, who remained an only child.

Her loving and wealthy parents gave Hannah Rachel a strong Jewish education, which her brilliant mind absorbed eagerly. She began to pray three times a day, wearing a tallit, taking on practices traditionally reserved to males. When her parents objected at first, the little girl declared, "why do people make such a great difference between men and women? I will tear down the fences!"

While still a child, Hannah Rachel revealed, through supernatural knowledge, that a local Jewish butcher was selling non-kosher meat – thus saving her town from further transgressions. When she reached 12, the age of bat mitzvah, she began to put on tfillin, another practice traditionally reserved to men.

At age 13, two crises shook her life. She fell passionately in love with a young man and won her parents consent to become engaged to him — a choice as radical in her social context as her "male" religious behaviour. The same year, her mother passed away. Hannah Rachel prayed often at her mother's grave, a traditional practice of pious women. On one of these visits to the graveyard, she fainted and fell into a coma.

She became known throughout the region

When she awakened, she declared that she had been granted an additional, lofty soul, and she broke off her engagement. She devoted herself to prayer and study, and people began to seek her out as a healer. Rebbe Motl of Chernobyl told her worried father, "Monesh, your daughter is going on a new path. Leave her alone."

When Hannah Rachel was 19, past the regular age of marriage in her society, her father died and left her a large inheritance. She said Kaddish for her father as a son would have and used some of her inheritance to buy a building in the centre of Ludmir. There she established her own place of prayer and study, called the gornshtibl, the upper-storey prayer house. Enough money remained to support her for the rest of her life.

Now she could immerse herself in the spiritual consciousness which led her to teach, "a person who does not see God everywhere does not see God anywhere".

Reaching out to others with the gornshtibl as a home base, Hannah Rachel became a spiritual advisor and teacher, judge in questions of Jewish law, prayer leader, travelling preacher, healer, exorcist, visionary and miracle-worker and leader of Shabbat meals and other chassidic gatherings.

She drew a following mainly of women and working-class men. Unlike male rebbes, she did not ask for donations from her followers, who were known as the Maiden of Ludmir's Chassidim. Some of them lived into the 20th century, still revering her memory and telling her stories.

Various other people in Ludmir, however, treated Hannah Rachel with indifference, or mocked her as crazy, or spread the terrifying rumour that she had not been granted a high soul, but possessed by a dybbuk. Still, into her mid-20s, she was the major chassidic spiritual figure in Ludmir. She eclipsed the only other chassidic leaders based there, the relatively uncharismatic son and grandson of the great Rebbe Shlomo Karliner. Her travels as a preacher and the stories told about her made her known throughout the region.

Gradually, the opposition to her coalesced into pressure to become a wife and mother. Rebbe Motl of Chernobyl took it on himself to convince Hannah Rachel to get married. The discussion between them was long and stormy; yet, being argued with as an equal by a renowned spiritual master, her parents' rebbe, was an honour in itself to Hannah Rachel.

In the end, temporarily convinced by Reb Motl's arguments, or succumbing to pressure, Hannah Rachel agreed to marry a pious man. But the day after the wedding, she left him without consummating the marriage. Some say that her husband saw the Shekhinah as a fiery wall keeping him from her.

After this interlude Hannah Rachel continued her spiritual work, but something had changed. Among both her opponents and her Chassidim, some felt that agreeing to marry had shown she was just a normal person. She was less confident in her own path, more reluctant to give advice or blessings. Teasing children chased after her in the streets.

There are scarcely any stories about her from the next 25 years of her life. Perhaps it was during this time that she taught: "A person accompanied by holy thoughts on their life's journey is not alone and wretched, for the noble thoughts shelter them from loneliness."

Grasping the heart's 'pure thought'

When she was over 50 — in her day, old age — Hannah Rachel left Ludmir and undertook the arduous journey to the land of Israel. Seeing that she was leaving them, Ludmir's Jews, even the many who had been her opponents, felt the greatness of their loss. They gave her kvitlekh (notes with written prayers) to take with her to the holy places.

She accepted the kvitlekh, but, she said, "only as a simple Jew". She added, "perhaps in the Holy Land I will regain my powers."

She gave her prayer house to the community. It was used for prayer and study by the followers of the descendants of Rebbe Motl of Chernobyl until the Nazis destroyed it.

Many versions of the biography of the Maiden of Ludmir end here. But there are stories of her life in the land of Israel based on eyewitness accounts by people who vividly remembered her: grey-eyed, short in stature, still beautiful, with an inner glow.

Hannah Rachel did regain her powers in the Holy Land. She settled in Jerusalem among other chassidic Jews from her region (Volhynia), who knew her as a righteous and learned woman. Many Jews in 19th century Jerusalem were elderly, people who had journeyed there late in life to devote themselves to spirituality and to die in the Holy Land. Hannah Rachel particularly reached out to elderly women – Yiddish speakers like herself, but also Yemenite women and even Muslim Arabs.

She led gatherings around her Shabbat table like a rebbe. Reversing the custom of male rebbes, however, the followers gathered around Hannah Rachel's table were all women, while chassidic men listened from a separate room. On weekdays, she would pray at the Kotel in tallit and tefillin, surrounded by men and women seeking her blessing.

Every Rosh Chodesh, she would lead a group of women to Rachel's Tomb. There she would lead "a magnificent prayer service with greatly impressive rituals." Each Simchat Torah she led a women's service where she made the symbolic rounds with the Torah scroll — carried before her by a male assistant — as women gathered around and men watched from the "women's balcony." All that day she invited women to approach and kiss the holy scroll.

Not every detail of Hannah Rachel's career in the land of Israel was happy. Legend has her trying in vain to force the coming of the messiah through kabbalistic rituals. At least one ritual was supposed to be conducted with a male mystic who let her down and did not arrive; he had been distracted by Elijah the Prophet, because the time was not yet right. Some had the impression that "she greatly missed the good old days" in Ludmir.

Although Hannah Rachel continued on her unique path of holiness and leadership until the end of her life, there is no indication that her death was particularly noted. On the other hand, there are reports that for decades afterwards women would light candles and pray at her grave. And at home in Ludmir, well into the 20th century, women would respond to crises in the Jewish community by wishing that the Maiden would return.

In 2004, with information from Deutsch's research, Rabbi Ruth Gan Kagan, working with the traditional burial society, organized the building of a new tombstone on a gravesite in Jerusalem identified, by a mixture of evidence and guesswork, as Hannah Rachel's. Women and men are again lighting candles and praying there.

Today, many of us who know the story of Hannah Rachel seem to think that her life would have been easier in our time, in our own communities. Lubavitchers claim her as proof of the spiritual potential of women in Chassidism. In the Jewish Renewal movement, she is considered a trailblazer of feminist spirituality.

But would any of us really have been at ease with a woman who, from childhood on, was so immersed in old ways, so indifferent to convention and so confident in her unique path? I suspect that we, too, are too limited to comprehend the path on which her own desires guided her. As Hannah Rachel taught, "the intellect is completely unable to grasp a pure thought that flows from the desires of the heart."

Justin Jaron Lewis, of the University of Manitoba, is the author of Imagining Holiness: Classic Hasidic Tales in Modern Times (McGill-Queen's University Press.)

Businesswoman, diarist, 'learned woman'

Portrait painted by Leopold Pilchowski (1869-1933) Bertha Pappenheim posed as Glikl.

Glikl of Hameln

Glikl bas Judah Leib of Hameln (1646-1724), also known as Glückel of Hameln, wrote the earliest surviving autobiography by a Jewish woman.

Her remembrances were recorded to drive away the melancholy that came with the death of her first husband, and to acquaint her children with their ancestry and family ideals.

This engrossing and entertaining document, written in western Yiddish (also known as Judaeo-German), interweaves pious tales and moral messages with Glikl's accounts of events in her own life and those of her family and larger social circle. It is a major historical source for the lives of Jews in early modern Central Europe.

By Judith R. Baskin

Glikl was born in Hamburg into the prosperous milieu of Court Jews, who provided goods and financial services to Central European rulers. She was well-educated and well-read in vernacular Jewish literature. She may also have had some knowledge of Hebrew and German; her memorial notice characterizes her as "a learned woman" (melumedet in Hebrew).

Betrothed at 12 and married at 14, Glikl was the mother of 14 children, 12 of whom survived to adulthood. Glikl, who was active in business (mainly precious stones and jewelry) and pious in religious observance, married her children into prominent families across Europe, from Prague to London.

Hayyim Hameln, Glikl's beloved husband, died when he was 44. Glikl later remarried and suffered grave financial and emotional injuries when her second husband, Cerf Levy of Metz, became bankrupt.

Glikl's business activities reflect the growing economic participation of Jews in the non-Jewish world in the early modern period, while her religious and secular learning speaks to the broader horizons and new educational opportunities available to some 17th century Jews, including women.

Glikl's literacy is not surprising, since most Jewish women in late medieval and early modern Central Europe were taught to read and write in the vernacular for their business undertakings. However, literacy did not mean that women had access to books.

Prior to the 16th century, there were few literary texts in Yiddish and they would not have been widely available. The advent of printing changed this dearth of reading matter by making the production of popular literature inexpensive and profitable. Vernacular books for the non-learned segments of Jewish society were readily available by the 1530s. They had an important role in expanding the horizons of many Jews, including women.

Rabbinic injunctions against women's learning were believed to apply to Talmud study, but not to the Bible or legal rulings concerning women's domestic activities. Thus, translations and paraphrases of the Hebrew Bible were among the first vernacular printed books. They often included homilies on the weekly synagogue readings from the Torah and Prophets, as well as stories, legends and parables drawn from rabbinic literature, mystical writings, histories and travel accounts.

She contributed to genre of Jewish ethical wills

Ethical treatises, known as musar books, which discussed proper conduct and women's religious and marital obligations, were also popular. Printed Yiddish texts included translations of the Hebrew and Aramaic prayers of the synagogue liturgy; these were necessary for men with weak Hebrew skills.

Far more central to women were the Tkhines, vernacular supplicatory prayers which were intended for female use in the synagogue and elsewhere. Printed collections of such prayers began to appear in the 16th century. They demonstrate what women prayed about and offer insight into how they understood their spiritual lives (see Voices of the Matriarchs: Listening to the Prayers of Early Modern Jewish Women, by Chava Weissler).

Glikl's memoir indicates her familiarity with such works: it is imbued with a deep feeling of connection to the Jewish community and a strong sense of religious conviction. In writing about her experiences, Glikl not only informed her children about important events that had affected their prosperous and eminent connections scattered across Europe, but she also contributed to the medieval and early modern genre of Jewish ethical wills.

Authors of ethical wills expressed pious advice to their children on how best to live in the world and often included autobiographical details. Glikl was well acquainted with such literature, and refers to several of her contemporaries who left admirable ethical wills for their children, including at least one woman.

Glikl's chronicle, however, goes far beyond the limited boundaries of the usual ethical will in its length and its literary expansiveness. Certainly, there is much in Glikl's piety that is formulaic. She begins her memoir by reminding her children that "the Torah is like a rope which the great and gracious God has thrown to us as we drown in the stormy sea of life that we may seize hold of it and be saved; in the holy Torah we may find and learn all that we need for our journey through this world to the world to come."

Glikl advises her sons and daughters to adhere to the kernel of the Torah: to love their neighbours as themselves. She also tells them to put aside a fixed time for Torah study; only then should they go diligently about their business, "for providing your wife and children a decent livelihood is likewise a commandment of God." Above all, she emphasizes that they must be honest in money matters with both Jews and gentiles, lest the name of Heaven be profaned.

Glikl also transcends conventional wisdom; as historian Natalie Zemon Davis has shown, she makes original use of stories she culled from her voluminous reading, incorporating them into her narrative to provide challenging moral and religious commentary on difficult events in her own life.

In utilizing this rhetorical model, Glikl is following the pattern of rabbinic sermons that used literary materials from both secular and religious sources to enhance and drive home elevated moral lessons.

I would suggest as well that what made it possible for Glikl to demonstrate her piety by writing so eloquently and confidently was a lifetime of reading that allowed her to see herself and her experiences in a larger literary and ethical context.

Thus, Glikl begins her personal history with a problematic fable about the respective duties of parents and children. This story about a bird and its three offspring makes the point that children will never repay their parents' efforts directly, no matter what promises they make along the way. The only parental recompense is to hope that offspring will do as much for their own children as their parents have done for them.

As Glikl writes, "We should, I say, put ourselves to great pains for our children, for on this the world is built, yet we must understand that if children did as much for their parents, the children would quickly tire of it."

Piety through writing

She connects this tale with her own sinful state and the reasons why she is not as good and pious as she would like to be: "No dear children, I am a sinner. Every day, every hour, and at every moment of my life I have sinned nearly all manner of sins. God grant that I may find the means and occasion for repentance. But, alas, the cares of providing for my orphaned children and the ways of the world have kept me far from that state."

With this, Glikl's voice is clearly heard: she has spent a lifetime sacrificing herself and her higher aspirations for her children's benefit. She realizes they will never fully appreciate her efforts. Her only comfort is that they too will extend themselves to the utmost for their ungrateful offspring.

Couching her feelings of disappointment and abandonment in the language of piety and acceptance, Glikl demonstrates that the experience of reading has taught her to speak on several levels at once. Moving beyond the world reflected in Yiddish ethical guides and the Tkhines, Glikl seems to see life as essentially a mystery in which people, despite their many individual grievances, will find their only anchor in faith and in raising and launching children into the world as hostages to the future.

Glikl also recounts a life shaped by the inescapable consequences of gender. At one point, she writes: "Even if our sages say, 'It is better not to be born,' meaning that men have so much to endure in this sinful world, still I thank and praise my Creator that he made me according to His will, and beg Him to take me under His holy charge."

When Glikl thanks God for making her according to the divine will, a reader familiar with Jewish tradition hears the daily prayer a woman recites thanking God for making her according to His will, in place of the male version thanking God for not having made him a woman. Yet we sense Glikl's pain and anger at the restrictions imposed on her by Jewish tradition.

When her husband was on his deathbed, other family members embraced him, but Glikl herself, in a state of niddah, was unable to do so. As she writes: "I said to my husband, 'Dearest heart, shall I embrace you, for I am unclean.' For I was then at a time I dared not touch him. And he said, 'God forbid, my child — it will not be long before you take your cleansing.' But, alas, it was then too late."

At the same moment, when a friend came to ask Hayyim Hameln if he had any last wishes, Glikl records that her husband said, "None. My wife knows everything. She shall do as she has always done." In this highly ironic juxtaposition, Glikl's remembered anger is palpable. The equal partner with her beloved husband in all their personal affairs and business ventures, Glikl was nonetheless separated from him at the most tragic moment of their lives together because she was female.

Glikl was an exceptional individual who gives us the missing voices of centuries of Jewish women. The new technology of printing led to the proliferation of Yiddish books that allowed her to be a reader.

Her extensive and deeply engaged reading, together with her immense energy and strong sense of self, empowered her to express her piety and connection with God by becoming a writer.

Inscribing her life in a vernacular language considered appropriate only for women and uneducated men, Glikl produced something new. Her radical expansion of the traditional genre of the ethical will into the realm of autobiography signalled the major social, political and religious changes that awaited Central European Jewry as they entered modernity.

All translations of Glikl's memoirs in German, French, Hebrew and English omit significant amounts of the actual text. Two English translations are The Life of Glückel of Hameln, 1646-1724, written by herself and translated and edited by B. Z. Abrahams. There is also The Memoirs of Glückel of Hameln, translated by M. Lowenthal and used in this article. For further reading I strongly recommend Women on the Margins: Three Seventeenth-Century Lives, by Natalie Zemon Davis.

First modern female Hebrew poet

Rachel Luzzatto Morpurgo

By Howard Tzvi Adelman

Although in writing history, the term first must be used advisedly, Rachel Luzzatto Morpurgo (1790-1871) of Trieste was the first modern female Hebrew poet, actually one of the first modern Hebrew poets and one of the few women Hebrew poets in Jewish history. Her life and writings, consisting of both poetry and letters, show the influence of the European Enlightenment, specifically the Hebrew version of it — the Haskalah — which involved the revitalization of Hebrew literature.

Rachel Luzzatto, like most Jewish women with any education, never attended school and acquired all her learning at home from private tutors and family members, including uncles from both sides of her family.

She and her younger cousin, Samuel David Luzzatto (1800-1865), born in the same house as she, studied Hebrew language and literature together. They studied Torah, Rashi's Bible commentaries, several tractates of the Talmud, among them Megillah, Bahya ibn Pakuda's Hovot Halevavot, Isaac Aboab's Menorat Hamaor and Elijah de Vidas' Reshit Hokhmah.

She also read the classic and complex text of Kabbalah, the Zohar, which her cousin Samuel purchased for her at her request in 1817, although, ever the rationalist, he did not approve of her studying it. They also followed the Hebrew periodical literature, the major vehicle of communication for enlightened Jews throughout Europe

Rachel polished her Hebrew skills in correspondence and conversations with Samuel. In 1816, he wrote a Hebrew poem that chided her for disliking every young man whom her parents suggested to her for marriage ("every good young man and doer of valor is contemptible?").

She responded in Hebrew, mimicking his metre, form, content and even vocabulary, describing how she had found a young man, but her parents did not approve of him. This modern Hebrew poetic dialogue was like earlier Hebrew literary dialogues about the virtues and vices of women found in the Bible and in Hebrew literature from medieval Spain and Renaissance Italy; their dialogue, however, was about men.

Finally, in 1819 when she was 29, her parents relented and allowed her to marry the man of her choice: Jacob Morpurgo, a businessman from Gorizia, which like Trieste was under Austrian control.

Nevertheless, after her marriage, because her husband disapproved of her studying and writing, she was no longer able to devote much time or energy to it. In a poem she wrote five years after her wedding, with either prophetic premonition or ironic hindsight, she expressed the hope that "no longer will I remain silent."

As Jewish tradition had urged for centuries, despite some exceptions she served him, did housework, turned a lathe and sewed, making most of her own clothes. She reared children, three sons and one daughter, none of whom ever married. The only time she found for writing was in moments stolen from housework, late at night and on the first day of each Hebrew month, Rosh Chodesh, a day when Jewish women traditionally did no work.

Her cousin, Samuel David Luzzatto, known as Shadal, became a prominent figure in modern Jewish thought and Hebrew literature and served as her confidant and patron in Hebrew writing. He credited her with a major role in influencing his love for Jewish learning in general and for Hebrew poetry in particular.

In 1847, 30 years after her original poetic exchange about men with Shadal, he had it published in a journal devoted to modern Hebrew literature and enlightenment (Kokhavei Yitzhak). As a result, she received much public recognition of her talent, and even her husband was now proud of her writing.

However, some enlightened readers of the journal, a few of whom wrote Hebrew poems in her honour, had difficulty accepting that a woman actually wrote them. Some claimed that a man using a female pseudonym had really written them.

Calling her Queen of the Hebrew Versifiers, several authors observed that she had left the way of women, whom they characterized as being without understanding and whose wisdom was in making veils and scarves, but nevertheless they praised her for rising above other women by pursuing her studies and acquiring wisdom. Others lamented the long silence of women's voices and the absence of their poetry. One compared her to the contemporary French Jewish actress of the same name, Eliza Rachel Felix (1821-1858).

Rachel Morpurgo expressed a sense of ambiguity about gender in her writing. On the one hand, in a letter to Shadal she invoked the matriarchs as well the patriarchs: "...may he who blessed our ancestors (avotenu) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Sarah, Rebecca, Leah and Rachel, bless the entire community of the congregation of Israel and may we merit and live and go up to offer paschal sacrifices upon the altar..." Such a comment also reflects the keen interest during the 19th century in not only a return of Jews to Palestine but also in the rebuilding the Temple and a return to offering sacrifices in it.

As earlier Hebrew wedding invitations and poetry written by men were often about the relationship between men, such as the groom and his father-in-law, the groom and his teacher, or the two fathers-in-law, Rachel wrote a wedding poem for a cousin, also named Rachel Luzzatto, about her relationship with the bride, For the one for whom my desire will be called (Lezot yikareh heftzi-bah):

Men's ambivalence hampered her

Rachel with Rachel is bonded like a necklace on the neck your love for me is an ornament on my head you are a crown.

Her poetry and letters in Hebrew and Aramaic showed an awareness of contemporaneous Hebrew literature, including comments about the accomplishments of other literary Jewish women. These included the Rabanit Tamar Luzzatto, wife of Mordecai Samuel Ghirondi, and Flora (1824-1910), the daughter of Meyer Randegger (1780-1853).

Flora, who with her sister Teressa ran a girls school in Trieste, made an Italian translation of the Haggadah (perush) that Flora's father published in an edition of the Haggadah in 1851. In the first edition of this Haggadah, however, Flora's father did not mention her name, rendering her educational and literary accomplishment invisible. However, Rachel's public acknowledgement of Flora's work might have been the reason that Flora's name appeared in the second edition of the Haggadah.

In 1855, when on their way to Palestine, the philanthropists Moses Montefiore and his wife Judith stopped in Trieste, Rachel expressed her desire at the age of 65 to accompany them there as a servant, a request that left no record in Montefiore's travel account.

In her ability to write in Hebrew, her passion to rebuild the Temple and her desire to travel to Palestine, Rachel presents the growing enthusiasm by some European Jews to live in Palestine. In her poetry, Rachel also recorded other themes, such as the burden of raising her children, the delivery of an anti-Jewish sermon and the Tur, a code of Jewish law.

On the other hand, despite her accomplishments, in a letter to Mendel Stern, editor of Kokhavei Yitzhak, Rachel wrote, "The truth is that it is not for a woman to come forward . . . but I feared that you would cast me into the depths of the sea when you saw that there was nothing substantial in my words but the way of women..."

Similarly, in 1847 when she learned about the praise that her work was receiving in the Hebrew periodical literature, she wrote a poem that included not only references to her fears of humiliation, but also citations of traditional expressions against women, such as "women are simple-minded" and "there is no wisdom for woman except the spindle."

Rachel Morpurgo regularly signed herself as The Worm, or Rimah the initials of Rachel Morpugo Haketanah, meaning, Little Rachel Morpurgo, expressions of seeming modesty, but often employed by prominent rabbis. Indeed, because her initials began with the letter resh, they have the appearance of referring to a rabbi.

Poems from Rachel Morpurgo's collection of poetry and letters, Ugav Rahel, published in 1890 and 1942, both now rare, were translated into several European languages, included in a few anthologies of modern Hebrew poetry and remembered in some of the histories of modern Hebrew literature. The emphasis, however, was often on her novelty and her uniqueness as the first female modern Hebrew poet, a unicum, rather than on her literary merits.

Unique or not, the first or not, the life of Rachel Luzzatto Morpurgo shows that one woman's literary accomplishments were highly charged because they could both reflect favourably on the status of the entire family in the community or could hurt their honour.

At each step of her literary accomplishments, from learning to read, to writing, to publishing, men's ambivalence or outright hostility hampered her progress. Advanced educational and literary accomplishments for Jewish women were unusual, but not impossible and, like those of Christian women, constituted a private, domestic matter and a testimony to the effectiveness of private instruction.

Jewish women could enter intellectual activity at home, in correspondence, at literary gatherings and in publications. The Jewish community had the same dilemma as Christian society, namely that while literary pursuits would draw women away from their domestic responsibilities, at the same time women's illiteracy would be counter-productive for the family and the community.

The generally poor state of Hebrew knowledge among Jewish women, however, was part of the wider lack of knowledge of Hebrew on the part of most, but certainly not all, Jews. As Hebrew education in the Yishuv and then the State of Israel made it possible for greater Hebrew literacy among all Jews there, Jewish women gradually joined the ranks of Hebrew writers.

From small town Lancaster to Philadelphia

Painting by Thomas Sully

[Rebecca Gratz]

By Jessica Lang

Rebecca Gratz, born in 1781, was the seventh of 12 children born to Michael Gratz and Miriam Simon. Michael Gratz was raised in Langendorf, Silesia. After the death of their father, the Gratz children, only teenagers, were largely cared for by their oldest brother, Hyman. In order to better his professional prospects, Barnard Gratz, Michael's older brother, arranged to join his cousin's exporting business in London. While there he developed a close working relationship with a Philadelphia merchant.

By the mid-1750s, Barnard moved to Philadelphia to pursue business opportunities and arranged that Michael should take his place in his cousin's business in London. In 1758, acting on his brother's invitation, Michael moved to Philadelphia.

During his first years in Philadelphia, Michael worked closely with his brother and successfully cultivated known business contacts. The two brothers bought land in western Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, and Indiana. They developed a supply business for settlers moving west and imported and sold British and Caribbean products.

One important business associate of the Gratz brothers was Joseph Simon, of Lancaster, Pa. Simon, an observant Jew who had immigrated to Lancaster around 1740, built a series of highly profitable partnerships with merchants who supplied traders and peddlers selling their supplies west.

On June 20, 1769, Michael Gratz married Miriam Simon, one of Joseph Simon's four daughters. They wed in Philadelphia in a ceremony that was well attended and considered an event of significant social importance. A year later, and every 18 to 36 months thereafter, Miriam gave birth to another child.

Rebecca Gratz was born in Lancaster, Pa., a small town where her maternal grandparents lived, approximately 70 miles from Philadelphia.

When the British occupied Philadelphia in 1777, the Gratz brothers, who actively worked to supply American troops with a range of supplies, took refuge in Lancaster, where they were well-connected professionally and personally. Rebecca and her older sister Sarah were both born during this time.

The Gratz family returned to Philadelphia in 1782 and became immersed in building a new larger synagogue, Kahal Kadosh Mikveh Israel, an institution that became central to Jewish communal life in Philadelphia and one that the extended Gratz family, Rebecca in particular, devoted themselves to developing.

Rebecca was raised in a family that was committed to the Jewish community, both locally and internationally — her family sent funds back to family members struggling in Silesia.

She was also raised in a strongly federalist community and as such taught about the importance of a virtuous citizenry, one that was highly influenced by the role of women as Republican mothers, responsible for inculcating and passing on the values of the republic to the next generation.

In many ways, as the Gratz family illustrates, commitment to Jewish life and adherence to the national ideology of the late 18th and early 19th century overlapped with and reinforced one another.

As with many women who came from families of means and who came of age in the post-revolutionary era, Rebecca Gratz's education consisted of both formal and informal elements. Formal education for women who came of age in the years prior to the revolution, if offered at all, focused on ornamental instruction largely devoted to handiwork, musicality, dance and French.

In contrast, post-revolutionary leaders advocated for women to be a more informed part of the citizenry, knowledgeable in literature and able to write, speak and spell and proficient in mathematics, bookkeeping and home economics.

As Benjamin Rush, a signatory of the Declaration of Independence and a Philadelphia physician and educator, noted, women should be "able to instruct their sons in the principles of liberty and government."

While little is known about Rebecca Gratz's formal education, she likely attended an academy for girls where she was taught literature, rhetoric, politics, mathematics and home economics. In addition to this, her informal education consisted of the many books and manuals in her parents' library, many of which would have been devoted to the instruction and intellectual development of children. As well, Rebecca had access to a range of Jewish texts, including Jewish liturgy, explanations of Jewish ritual and practice, Jewish history and Jewish philosophy.

By 1800, Rebecca had already tried her hand at poetry but, as she wrote to her sister Rachel in 1800, "...had long since given up all attempts" at it, citing her efforts as "poor nonsensical stuff."

While she returned to composing poetry later in her life, none of her poems were published. Instead, Rebecca turned to writing as a means to explore her own thoughts and ideas about topics such as romance, family, illness, duty, spirituality and community responsibility.

In 1800, when she was 19, presented specific reasons to engage in regular letter writing: two sisters were away from home on prolonged visits to family and friends and Michael Gratz suffered a stroke from which he never completely recovered. Rebecca gradually assumed the majority of nursing care for her father in spite of finding the work "agonizing" and a "trial," as she confided in a letter to one of her sisters.

While the entire Gratz family devoted considerable time to correspondence, both in order to conduct business and to reach friends and family, Rebecca, as many of her correspondents recognized, was exceptionally gifted with language. Her friend Maria, impatient with her own writing sensibility, wrote to Rebecca in 1801 "How I wish for that easy stile [sic] you possess."

Rebecca herself admits that writing and reading letters served as an important emotional support system. In 1800, while nursing her father, she wrote to her sister Sarah, "[letters] prevent anxiety — and give me the pleasure of conversing with you — therefore I write." Two years later she said in a letter to Maria that, "when my spirits are uncommonly depressed I fly to my desk and [re]read [your letters]."

Co-founded charities for needy

Rebecca spent much of her life nursing various family members through illness, childbirth and old age. In 1823, after the untimely death of her sister Rachel, Rebecca brought her six nephews and nieces home with her to raise. The many letters exchanged between Rebecca and her family and friends detail her despair of the sickroom, her compassion and her commitment to her family. Faith is a topic increasingly addressed as more and more of her loved ones die.

In spite of these somber events and descriptions, Rebecca's letters also include references to men, love, and "attachments." While Rebecca never married, she enjoyed the friendship and attention of a number of men, many of whom became regular correspondents and visitors.

Because of Rebecca's status as the daughter of a wealthy businessman, and because she was known for her beauty and intellect, she was at the centre of Philadelphia society and engaged socially with visitors such as authors Washington Irving and Catherine Sedgwick.

FHBS first of its kind nationwide

She was introduced to Thomas Sully, a then relatively unknown painter who later painted several portraits of Rebecca. She met with Joseph Bonaparte when he visited the city and eventually became a correspondent with Maria Edgeworth, the British author.

In 1801, Rebecca took her first formal action to work on behalf of the needy in Philadelphia by creating, with 22 other women (one-third of whom were Jewish), a charity called The Female Association for the Relief of Women and Children in Reduced Circumstances (FA). The goal of the group was not to help "the needy indiscriminately, but for those whose circumstances were reduced." Assistance came in the form of funds and education for children in the families.

The founders of FA wanted to help those who, for accepted reasons (such as the failure of the family's business or illness or death of the family's breadwinners), suffered a reversal of fortune.

The FA founders believed that such women were virtuous and, consequently, worthy of assistance without suffering the ignominy of public aid.

In keeping with the Jewish tradition of anonymous giving, the FA never publicized the names of fund recipients.

The second organization Rebecca helped found, in 1815, was the Philadelphia Orphan Asylum. Guided by a Christian ethos and led by primarily Presbyterian women, she remained on the board or working as a fundraiser for both groups for more than 30 years.

Of all her sisters, Rebecca remained closest with Sarah who, also unmarried, shared the many responsibilities towards the extended family.

Sarah's death in 1817 marked a changing point in Rebecca's life, one that was further compounded by the death of her sister Rachel in 1823 and by the loss of a number of nieces and nephews. Rebecca withdrew from Philadelphia society and became committed to the study and practice of Jewish ritual.

In 1819, Rebecca, with a number of other women from Mikveh Israel, the congregation to which her father and uncle had contributed, created a charitable society for needy Jewish women.

The Female Hebrew Benevolent Society (FHBS) was the first of its kind nationwide. As with the FA, FHBS directors wanted to give needy families the opportunity to educate their children, specifically with an eye towards Jewish rituals and practices. They also wanted to be sure to award help to those who were pious but needy, virtuous but suffering from compromised circumstances not of their own doing. In this way, both organizations sought to counter a belief that charitable foundations promoted laziness, malingering, or other forms of "immoral" behavior.

'Crowning happiness' was association with teachers

Simultaneous with her work in creating the FHBS, Rebecca began working on perhaps her single most lasting contribution to American Jewish life, the creation of the first Hebrew Sunday school.

While the personal losses that Rebecca suffered led her to reaffirm her connection to Judaism, a national movement of Christian evangelism gained momentum during these same years.

The FHBS was partly inspired by Rebecca's devotion to her community, but also by a recognition that missionaries often targeted the poor. This same confluence of personal identification and public awareness resulted in the founding of the Hebrew Sunday school in 1838. The founding of it was officially an action of the FHBS, but one that came directly from Rebecca's urging to address "the mental impoverishment of those who are rising to take their places among the thousands of Israel scattered throughout the families of the earth."

The FHBS acknowledged Rebecca's wishes by founding a Sunday school, one modelled in many ways on the Protestant Sunday schools that had been established in Philadelphia since the 1790s. Protestant Sunday schools offered, through catechistic teaching, the opportunity for poor children to acquire literacy.

Rebecca's school, which adopted books published by the Christian American Sunday School Union (she carefully modified inappropriate content), was set to meet on Sundays, a non-holy day for Jews, in order to teach Jewish ritual, practice and liturgy. At the same time, Rebecca emphasized the importance of spending the Sabbath with family.

Rebecca was elected the Sunday school's first superintendent and served in this capacity for more than 25 years. The school's teachers and administrators were all women, the first time women played such a prominent role in Jewish education.

One of their goals was accessibility to the Philadelphia Jewish community. To achieve this, Rebecca and the FHBS determined that the school would be co-educational and that classes would be taught in English. The curriculum was devoted to biblical stories, Jewish philosophy, Maimonides' 13 Principles of Faith, Jewish values and Jewish law.

In one of her final reports, Rebecca said that the "crowning happiness of my days has been my association with my beloved companions [the teachers and managers of the Hebrew Sunday school] in the duties we have shared together."

Rebecca made concerted efforts to train other women around the country in Jewish community organization. The result was that her example inspired the founding of charitable institutions, many of which were Jewish, in cities nationwide. The Philadelphia institutions she helped establish had a long and rich life.

Rebecca Gratz died on Aug. 27, 1869, at age 88. She had outlived all but one sibling and many friends, nieces and nephews. In 1986, the Sunday Hebrew school merged with the Talmud Torah Schools of Philadelphia and to this day continues to educate Jewish students.

An icon of selfless devotion

[Henrietta Szold]

If you were to ask a Jewish woman in the 21st century to name the most prominent Jewish woman of the 20th century, the odds are that her response would be a single name: Golda Meir.

Though surely not wrong, the answer is obviously incomplete. Most especially it omits the commanding and equally vital figure in Jewish history, Henrietta Szold (1860-1945). Both women have become icons of their time in the sense that they are readily recognizable symbols with powerful cultural significance for the Jewish people.

Meir is a symbol of the Zionist woman's indomitable will to achieve her ideals in the hitherto male public realm of Israeli life and politics; Szold is a symbol of the Zionist woman's compassionate determination in her utterly selfless devotion to the healing of the sick, to the advance of modern medicine and to the rescue of thousands of children from the ravenous Nazi craving for Jewish blood.

By Carole Kessner

Because Golda's work was in the public sphere, especially in her role as the first female prime minister of the State of Israel, it is obvious why today her name would be the first to come to mind. But in her time, Henrietta Szold, too, was revered, respected and renowned. Her work, however, was in the less public realms of Jewish intellectuals, social justice activists, and fighters for human rights. Hers was the caring heart and will that created Hadassah, and hers was the anguished heart that created Youth Aliyah.

Szold's story begins in 1860 in Baltimore, Md., a year after her parents had emigrated from their native Austria-Hungary. Having been newly appointed as the rabbi of Baltimore's Congregation Oheb Shalom, Benjamin Szold and his wife Sophie arrived in the United States in 1859. Their daughter Henrietta, was born on Dec. 21, 1860, the first of eight daughters — two of whom would die in infancy and one at the age of 26.

She was born at a crux in American history: six weeks before her birth, Abraham Lincoln had been elected the 16th president of the United States, and on Apr. 12, 1861, the Confederate army under Gen. Pierre Beauregard opened fire on Fort Sumter in Charleston, S.C., and the civil war began.

Later in her life, Szold could still stir up memories of the nation's shock at the assassination of President Abraham Lincoln. At age four, Henrietta had heard the sad whistle of the train that carried the body of the martyred president as it stopped in Baltimore. She had been among the throngs that watched the mournful funeral procession as it passed through the grieving city, transporting the flag draped casket to lie in state before resuming its last journey to Lincoln's burial place in Springfield, Ill.

Yes, Henrietta Szold was born at a moment in American history that would forever stamp her as categorically American. And yet, Szold, who died six months before the end of the Second World War, on Feb. 13, 1945, at the age of 84, would experience in her long and active life transformative events that would make significant claims on her American identity.

Eleven years younger than Emma Lazarus (1849-1887) and 38 years older than Golda Meir(1898-1978), Henrietta Szold's long life not only reflected the genteel worlds of Lazarus's victorian America and German-Sephardic Jewish heritage, but also Golda Meir's immigrant Russian Jewish world in America and her life in the Palestinian Yishuv.

The first influence on the young Henrietta Szold was that of her parents. Rabbi Szold was that quintessential German-Jewish intellectual who had been influenced by the enlightenment of Moses Mendelssohn. German, not Yiddish, was Rabbi Szold's language of conversation and sermon. He earned his smichah(rabbinical ordination) at the Presburg Yeshiva and had a secular education at the Universities of Vienna and Breslau.

While a student at Vienna he had participated in the revolution of 1848 and had been exiled from the city with fellow liberal students when the revolution failed. Rabbi Szold's congregation, Oheb Shalom, was drawn from the large German-Jewish immigrant community which, at the time, comprised one-fifth of Baltimore's population.

He was revered as a compassionate and deeply devoted spiritual leader and was widely acknowledged as a superb scholar of Judaism, but his social liberalism did not carry over to his insistence on strict traditional religious practice or to his opposition to the burning Jewish topic of the day, reform radicalism.

Henrietta joined Hebrew Literary Society

Henrietta's mother, Sophie Schaar Szold, the daughter of a well-to-do Hungarian landowner and brewer, had been tutored at home and was accomplished in the Hungarian and German culinary and cultural arts. In Baltimore she ran a tight but elegant domestic ship, the better to create continuity and comfort for her husband, as well as exemplary domestic instruction for her daughter.

Rabbi Szold's first born daughter Henrietta was his true intellectual heir. From him she received the attention and education that customarily was given to an oldest son. Benjamin Szold was quick to recognize her ability and intellect.

From him, Henrietta learned German, English, French and Hebrew as well as a range of secular studies, but most importantly he gave her a rigorous grounding in Judaism. Perhaps his decision to educate her Jewishly was an unconscious redress of those German women of a half century earlier, the famous salon Jewesses, who were provided with excellent secular educations, but denied Jewish education and later embraced assimilation and often conversion.

Meanwhile, her feisty mother taught her the domestic arts of cooking, sewing and gardening, imprinting on her daughter's psyche the conviction that primacy for a woman was marriage and motherhood. Much later in Henrietta's life, this counsel would have painful repercussions, but it also would provide the channel for sublimated creativity.

Henrietta was so gifted a student that by the time she reached her teens she had become her father's amanuensis, his editor, his translator and his right-hand girl. Her complete deferential devotion and scrupulous attention to her father's scholarly pursuits, however, set in place an emotional pattern that had great effect on the events of her life.

After her comprehensive home schooling, Henrietta Szold attended Western Female High School; it has since been reported that her record there has never been equaled. Upon graduation in 1877, she was instantly offered a job at the fashionable Misses Adams's academy for girls, teaching French, German, mathematics and botany.

Simultaneously she taught at the Oheb Shalom religious school and gave adult classes in Bible and Jewish history. Meanwhile, Szold enhanced her own education by attending lectures at the newly established Johns Hopkins and the Peabody Institute. As if she were not sufficiently occupied, she began a writing career of her own, serving as the Baltimore correspondent of the New York Jewish Messenger, signing her articles Sulamith.

By the time Henrietta Szold was in her 20s, the Jewish community had experienced a sea change. The draconian discriminatory Russian May Laws of 1881 drove masses of Jews to seek passage across the ocean to North America.

The port of Baltimore was a popular destination for the fleeing Jews who almost overnight created a Baltimore Russian Jewish immigrant ghetto. There were intellectuals and Hebrew scholars among the new immigrants, who not surprisingly gravitated to the Szolds' circle and soon formed a Hebrew Literary Society, which Henrietta joined. In turn, they sponsored Henrietta's unique idea for a practical experiment in adult education: night school for immigrants. Henrietta taught and administered the school until 1898 when the city took it over. Szold's night school became the main model for the absorption of immigrants in America, later so comically depicted in Leo Rosten's classic The Education of Hyman Kaplan.

The arrival of so many Russian Jews played a key role for Szold in another way. Though these Russian Jewish intellectuals had fled to the United States, they referred to themselves as hovevei Zion (lovers of Zion) and were passionately committed to the idea of a physical and spiritual return of the Jews to their ancient land in Palestine. Though they did not emigrate there themselves, they raised money, advanced the cause of Hebrew language and literature and did everything they could to promote interest in Eretz Israel and help support those who did live there.

These proto-Zionists profoundly inspired Henrietta Szold, and although her father did not espouse the cause, affection for these Russians turned his daughter into a lifelong Zionist. It was at this time too that Henrietta was given the chance to turn her love for Jewish scholarship into paid professional work.

She became the secretary of the Jewish Publication Society, in which capacity she translated many books, did the major part of the work for the first American Jewish Year Book and was sole editor of the 1904-1908 volumes. Szold also took a major role in assembling the Jewish Encyclopedia.

In 1902, Rabbi Benjamin Szold died. This was a traumatic loss for Henrietta who not only had adored him, but for so long had selflessly subordinated her own intellectual inclinations to his. She was now 42 years old and unmarried. She had made many close male friends within the Szold intellectual circles, but unlike her sisters, who all would marry, Henrietta apparently never had developed any romantic attachments. She was, however, now free to pursue her own intellectual interests.

Appalled by poverty and disease in Palestine

In 1903, Henrietta and her mother moved to New York City. Having taken the most unusual step of making application to the recently established all male Jewish Theological Seminary, she soon learned from her friend, Cyrus Adler (later the chancellor of the seminary), that she would be accepted as a special student. She was the first and only woman admitted.

At the seminary she studied Hebrew language and texts while continuing her work for the Jewish Publication Society. The Seminary, however, proved to be the backdrop for the most devastating and humiliating episode of Henrietta Szold's life: she would finally experience love.

At the seminary Szold met, studied, and worked with the brilliant German-Jewish scholar, the author of the monumental Legends of the Jews, Professor Louis Ginzberg. Though he was 13 years her junior, she became infatuated — indeed obsessed — with him.

Once again she assumed the role of amanuensis, editor, collaborator and translator. And once again she willingly subordinated her work to his. They became inseparable and were thus observed by the close-knit German- Jewish social circle of the JTS. The relationship carried on for five years.

Henrietta, by this time 48 years old, continued to believe that Ginzberg would propose marriage — out of timid inexperience and her customary Victorian decorum, she kept her feelings to herself. Thus, a massive shock sent her into a profound physical and emotional depression when Ginzberg returned from a European trip in the summer of 1908 and informed Henrietta that he was now engaged to a young woman he had met only three times. The powerful story of Szold's unrequited love is fully described and documented in Baila Shargel's superb book: Lost Love: The Untold Story of Henrietta Szold.

Sophie Szold, a most practical woman, countered her daughter's breakdown with plans to go abroad. Taking a six-month leave, Henrietta and her mother embarked on a destiny changing trip to Europe and Palestine.

During her sojourn in Palestine, Szold was enchanted by the landscape and inspired by the spirit, but appalled by the widespread conditions of poverty and disease. Equally aghast, her mother exclaimed, "here is work for you. This is what your group ought to be doing."

When Henrietta returned home in 1910, at the age of 49, her true vocation began. She would devote the rest of her life to Zionism and the health, education, and social welfare of the Yishuv.

Willing acceptance of her mother's cautionary charge, and an exasperating experience as honorary secretary of the mostly male Federation of American Zionists, propelled Henrietta Szold into envisioning a national women's Zionist organization devoted to practical projects.

Her dream became reality on Feb. 24, 1914, when the 20 members of Daughters of Zion, Hadassah chapter, met in Rabbi Judah Magnes's Temple Emanu-El, constituting the founding session of the national organization of Zionist women. Magnes himself urged the adoption of the simple name, Hadassah.

Saving endangered children her greatest contribution

At this session Szold outlined her critique of the deplorable conditions she saw in Palestine. A few months later the group began to think of possible projects: an American style visiting nurse service, a maternity hospital, a school for midwives, a baby nursery and more. This was Zionism in a feminist mode — though Szold would resist the label.

The first important project was the establishment of a visiting nurse system. It began on Jan. 18, 1913, when Hadassah sent two American nurses, Rose Kaplan and Rachel Landy, to Palestine. They leased a house and set up shop in Mea Shearim, the orthodox area of Jerusalem. Though expansion was severely curtailed by the First World War, by 1918 Hadassah arranged to send the American Zionist Medical Unit to Palestine, where it established nursing, medical and dental clinics, hospitals and infant care stations. It also dispatched sanitary engineers, equipment, medicine, food and administrators. Thus began the work of the newly named Hadassah Medical Organization (HMO).

In 1920 Henrietta Szold returned to Palestine. Her work in the Yishuv and in America was so successful that in 1927 the World Zionist Congress appointed her to the three member Palestine Executive with a portfolio for health and education. Adding to her tasks in these two fields, Szold worked to bring American scientific social work ideas to the Yishuv.

From 1931 to 1939 she held the social welfare portfolio of the Knesset Yisrael, using her authority to establish the Social Services Department of the Knesset, to set up social service agencies in the major cities and to establish the first school of social work.

Throughout her varied activities and experiences in the Yishuv during the '20s and '30s, Szold's faith in the justice of the Zionist cause never wavered. She was convinced that it would one day become a self-governing state of the Jews, though despite her first-hand experiences during the continual Arab attacks, disturbances and riots, she rejected the British plan for partition and supported her old friend Judah Magnes's organization Brit Shalom that envisioned a binational state of Jews and Arabs.

Szold died on Feb. 13, 1945. She did not live long enough to learn the full extent of the Holocaust, nor did she witness the establishment of the State of Israel or the wars of 1948, 1967, 1973, the war of attrition and the intifadas. Had she lived longer, she might have altered her view.

Notwithstanding the magnitude of her humanitarian contribution to the Yishuv, Szold's greatest contribution to the Jewish people was as the director of the newly formed agency Youth Aliyah. The calamitous Nuremberg Laws, enacted just after Hitler's election as chancellor of Germany, had placed Jewish children in dire circumstances — Youth Aliyah was a plan to save the endangered children from victimization.

It was conceived by Recha Freier in Germany in 1932, implemented by Szold in Palestine in 1933 and undertaken by Hadassah in America in 1935. By the outbreak of the Second World War, more than 5,000 children had arrived in Palestine. During the war years the agency rescued over 11,000 and sent them to kibbutzim and villages where they were trained and educated.

Szold had come out of retirement to set in motion a lifesaving process that continued beyond her lifetime to rescue endangered and disadvantaged children through each successive wave of immigration, from war-torn Europe, from the Jewish quarters of North African countries, from Islamic countries of the Middle East and later from Eastern Europe and Soviet Russia. To date, more than 350,000 children have been helped.

Henrietta Szold was a great woman whose first desire was to be a wife and mother, but sadly she never married and never bore children. Nonetheless, out of the pain and passion of unrequited love came the compassionate will to succor the needy, relieve the suffering and rescue the children.

Out of her great intellect and gift for administration came the creation of the largest women's and Jewish membership organization in the United States. In the words of Abba Eban, "Henrietta Szold was held by all in such deep affection that she was known as the 'mother of the Yishuv.'"

National heroine who resisted the Nazis

Hannah Szenes

When writing his History of the Middle Ages, Dutch historian Johan Huizinga was asked why he didn't include Joan of Arc. "Because I didn't want my story to have a heroine," he replied. Yet it is impossible to fully understand the Middle Ages without knowing the history of the women who lived at that time, just as it impossible to fully grasp the history of the Holocaust without focusing upon the girls and women who lived during those years.

A special chapter in the history of that period is devoted to the heroes and heroines who resisted the Nazis and their henchmen, and an even more unique one to those Jews then living outside occupied Europe who returned to enemy lands in order to assist their persecuted brethren. One of these was Hannah Szenes.

By Judith Tydor Baumel-Schwartz

Hannah Szenes was born as Anna Szenes in Budapest on July 17, 1921, to a wealthy, distinguished and assimilated Hungarian Jewish family. Her father, Bela Szenes, who died when she was a child, had been a well-known writer and dramatist and her mother, Katharine, an elegant homemaker.

Having been given a modern Hungarian education, Aniko, as her family called her, was exposed to anti-Semitism during her high school years, propelling her to learn more about her Jewish origins. It was at that time that she discovered the Zionist movement, joined a Zionist youth movement and learned Hebrew in preparation for immigration to Palestine.

In 1939, after completing high school, Szenes travelled to Palestine to further her education at the girls agricultural school in Nahalal, where she continued penning entries in the diary that she had begun in Hungary. Having completed a two-year agricultural course, Szenes joined the Sdot Yam kibbutz at Caeserea where she worked in the kitchen and in the kibbutz laundry.

Szenes' life was to change in 1943 when officials belonging to the Jewish Agency for Palestine approached her with a proposal: to join a clandestine military project whose ultimate purpose was to offer aid to beleaguered European Jewry. Members of the project would be trained as wireless officers and would be sent to Europe to aid the British armed forces, primarily assisting in getting downed Allied pilots out of occupied Europe and back to their own forces. Simultaneous with their British mission, the Jewish soldiers from Palestine would have a Zionist mission: to assist Jews in various parts of Europe and to aid in rebuilding the Zionist movement in these areas after the war would be over.

Szenes, who became a member of the Palmach (the pre-state fighting forces), joined a British army course for wireless operators and later participated in a course for paratroopers, learning to use the necessary equipment and prepare for parachuting into Europe. Before leaving Palestine for further training in Alexandria, she met with her brother Giora (Guiri) who had just arrived from Europe — the sole surviving member of her immediate family other than her mother — and the two spent the afternoon together on the shores of the Mediterranean, bringing each other up-to-date with personal and family news.

Captured within hours of crossing Hungarian border

Szenes' mission commenced in mid-March 1944 when she and several other Palestinian-Jewish volunteers (most of whom were also of European origin) were dropped into Yugoslavia in order to aid the anti-Nazi forces until being able to enter Hungary. The Nazi invasion of Hungary in March 1944 postponed their plans and during that time the group aided Tito's partisans in Yugoslavia. In May 1944 while in Yugoslavia, Szenes wrote one of her poems which would later become a symbol of the entire Parachutist's mission: Ashrei ha-Gafrur (Blessed is the match). The poem would ultimately reach Palestine only in September 1944 when another one of the parachutists from Palestine would bring it back with him upon his return from Europe.

Blessed is the match that is consumed in kindling flame.
Blessed is the flame that burns in the secret fastness of the heart.
Blessed is the heart with strength to stop its beating for honour's sake.
Blessed is the match that is consumed in kindling flame.

Szenes crossed from Yugoslavia to Hungary at the end of May, leaving her comrades with the wish that she hoped to meet them again in her native land. Three years later, one of the other parachutists described the last moments that he spent in the presence of the young woman who would become one of the symbols of Zionist heroism.

After walking together to the edge of the village the two said their last goodbyes. Szenes shook his hand, thanked him for the days and experiences together, and with the words "see you soon in the land of the enemy" parted from him and went on her way.

"I stood in place, my eyes accompanying the girl marching confidently toward an unknown fate, and before the road turned and took her out of our line of sight, she paused, turned, and waved goodbye. Who was to know that I would never see her again..."

Szenes was captured within hours of crossing the Hungarian border and sent to a prison in Budapest where she was tortured by the Hungarian authorities in the hope of receiving information regarding Allied wireless codes. Within days of entering Hungary, her two co-parachutists were also in Nazi hands, unaware of Szenes' whereabouts. Only one of them — Yoel Palgi — was to survive the war.

When the Hungarian authorities realized that Szenes would not be broken, they arrested her mother and the two women met for the first time in almost five years. Katherine Szenes had no idea that her daughter had left Palestine — not to speak of the fact that she was now in Hungary.

Initially shocked at seeing her child — now a young woman with bruised eyes who had lost a front tooth in the torture process — she rapidly regained her composure, conducting herself throughout the meeting with incredible dignity. Both mother and daughter refused to provide the authorities with the performance they expected nor did Szenes give them the intelligence information they had sought.

For three months, the two women were incarcerated in the same prison but were unable to catch more than short glimpses of each other. Following her sudden release in September 1944, Katharine Szenes spent most of her waking hours seeking legal assistance for her daughter, who — being a Hungarian national — was to be tried as a spy.

In November 1944, Hannah Szenes came up before a tribunal and with no legal assistance elegantly pleaded her own cause, warning the judges that the end of the war was nearing and that their own fate would soon hang in the balance. Convicted as a spy, Szenes was sentenced to death; however, the court had decided not to carry out the sentence with alacrity.

In the forefront of modern era's heroism

Nevertheless, her poignant speech during the trial was taken as a personal affront by the officer in charge, Colonel Simon, who came into her cell on the morning of Nov. 7 and presented her with two choices: to beg for a pardon, or to face death by a firing squad.

Refusing to beg clemency from her captors, whom she did not consider legally permitted to try her case, Szenes penned short notes to her mother and her comrades and went to her death at age 23 in a snow-covered Budapest courtyard, refusing a blindfold in order to face her murderers at the moment of her death. Her body was buried by unknown persons in the Jewish graveyard at Budapest.

Following her daughter's death Katharine Szenes was sent on the infamous Budapest Death March, from which she managed to escape. Having hid in the Hungarian capital until its liberation by the Soviet forces in January 1945, Katherine Szenes immigrated to Palestine where she joined her surviving child, Giora.

Five years later, in 1950, Hannah Szenes' heroic odyssey came to an end when her remains were brought from Hungary to Israel where they were reburied in the Parachutists section in the military cemetery on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem.

In 1946, the kibbutz movement to which Szenes had belonged — HaKibbutz HaMeuchad — published a book containing parts of her diary, poetry and plays. Since that time, the book has appeared in 15 Hebrew language editions, with an English edition first appearing in 1971.

Hannah's grave in Israel

Szenes' life epitomizes three of the virtues associated with the existence of humanity: family, loyalty and honour. At the same time, it also expresses several characteristics of modern Jewish life: initially, assimilation; as a later response, Jewish nationalism and finally, Zionist sacrifice.

Szenes' initial biography was that of hundreds of thousands — possibly millions — of Jews during the 20th century: acculturation into her non-Jewish surroundings. Similarly, her response to the rise of anti-Semitism was shared by Jews throughout Europe during that period: a renewed interest in a Jewish national movement which would remove Jews from a position of powerlessness. Her ultimate fate, the result of her volunteering for a mission to help her persecuted brethren in Hungary, has been portrayed both in Israel for decades and by Jews throughout the world, as the epitome of Zionist heroism, combining the qualities of family, loyalty and honour, propelling her not only into the Zionist pantheon but placing her in the forefront of Jewish heroism of the modern era.

Prof. Judy Baumel-Schwartz is the chair of the graduate program in Contemporary Jewry and associate professor of Jewish history at Bar-Ilan University in Ramat Gan, Israel.

Holocaust poet and playwright

Nelly Sachs

Although she was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1966 (sharing the honour with noted Israeli writer S. Y. Agnon), Nelly Sachs remains virtually unknown to the English-speaking world.

Two substantial collections of her poetry — O the Chimneys (1967) and The Seeker and other Poems (1970) — were published in translation 40 years ago, but they have long been out of print. New editions were promised for 2009 but they have yet to appear. Asked to name the woman still highly regarded in Germany as "the poet of the Holocaust," most readers in the West would be forced to remain mute.

The paradox and irony of Nelly Sachs' career is that the great burst of creative energy earning her this title was inspired by Nazi Germany's murder of European Jewry.

Born to a wealthy Jewish family in Berlin in 1891, Sachs spent her early years studying music and dance and writing unmemorable verse. But by 1940, the perilous situation for Jews in Europe was clear. With the aid of an earlier Nobel author, Selma Lagerlöf, she managed to escape with her mother to Sweden, which she adopted as her permanent home until her death in 1970.

By Lawrence L.Langer

Her verse took a more serious turn when she chose the fate of the people of Israel as her theme, and beginning in her 50s — a late date for such a distinguished poet — she produced a series of volumes and verse dramas that evoked in her unique metaphorical idiom the historical moment of the Holocaust.

If there is any doubt about the source of Nelly Sachs' poetic inspiration, we have her own words as testimony: "the dreadful experiences that brought me to the very edge of death and eclipse have been my instructors. If I had not been able to write, I would not have survived. Death was my teacher. How could I have occupied myself with something else; my metaphors are my wounds. Only through that is my work to be understood."

Her first collection was called In the Dwellings of Death (1947), its very title inviting her readers on a dark journey based not on an inner poetic vision but on known historical facts. Today, we can name those "dwellings." We call them ghettos and camps, boxcars and barracks, gas chambers and crematoriums.

A sympathetic voice for the mute millions

By entering the universe of her art, we embrace the imagination of disaster that defines our post-Holocaust era.

As a postwar writer immersed in the doom of her people, Sachs inherited a dual legacy: an ancient tradition of suffering often in seeming excess of comprehensible cause, but still compatible with spiritual aspiration and a tragic view of existence (the Book of Job is a prime example); and a modern experience of atrocity so far beyond comprehensible cause that the "tragic view of existence" collapses beneath its weight, bearing with it the vitality of the language once used to explore it.

One can imagine Sachs the poet picking through the rubble to rescue separate words that may have survived the disaster, maimed by the Germans abuse of familiar language as they carried out their plans of annihilation.

Simple terms that once carried no negative resonance now existed under a shadow of sinister associations: gas, shower, train, transport, selection, roll call, round up, number, chimney, smoke, to list only a few.

Sachs accepted the challenge of being physician to the wounded word, restoring enough health to an injured vocabulary to make it serve her poetic ambitions. Yet the dilemma she faced was not only restoring health to hurt words, but granting the chance that some terms were for the moment beyond curing. "Truth" and "dignity" (wahrheit and würde), for example, scarcely appear in her work, while "death" and "night," her two most frequently used nouns, repeatedly draw us into a tangled landscape of yearning and despair that is Sachs' unique poetic domain.

For the pre-Holocaust writer, night was still only an interval between twilight and dawn. But for a post-Holocaust lyric poet like Sachs, burdened by the memories of a murdered past, such dying had permanently altered the symbolic possibilities of night.

The imagery of night and death that bind Nelly Sachs to a particular historical event generates a poetic energy which lures the reader back into that world, even as words try to change its localized pain into a larger human lament.

The crematorium chimneys in O the Chimneys, the initial poem in her first postwar volume, are not signposts to the divine but accusatory fingers, each one an uninviting threshold "like the knife between life and death." This menacing image lingers through the later poems, a constant reminder that there will be no easy reunion between the smoke of Israel's body and the mysterious cosmos into whose distant regions that smoke slowly drifts.

Her initial stance is to develop a sympathetic voice for the mute millions who have been victims of Jewish genocide. This requires a stern collaboration from those who join her on her verbal voyage. She guides us through a realm whose gloom abides in memory even as the fragile beacon of her verse sheds dim light on its "margins" and "dens" and displaced heavens, where once accessible spiritual values now conceal the secret of their vanished comfort within a cloud of silence.

In Chorus of Solacers, one of the last poems from In the Dwellings of Death, she condenses into a few lines one of the main themes of her response to the Holocaust: the inadequacy of our verbal and spiritual resources to express and transcend the wounds of atrocity.

The opening strophe defines that burden:

Gardeners are we, who have lost our flowers
No healing herb can be planted anew
From yesterday to tomorrow
The blossoms of solace have budded too small
Do not suffice for the anguish of a child's tear.

Since the atrocity of the Holocaust cannot be undone or forgotten, the challenge is to find a source of consolation to lessen the horror of the loss and to soothe the pain of the child's tear. But there are memories in the soil of Nelly Sachs' metaphorical garden that resist both nurture and watering; the stark imagery of the poem's closing lines remind us that this Eden, where nature does not flourish, has once again lost its innocence:

The lightning bolts of grief do not allow
The field of forgetting to fall asleep.
Who among us may solace?
Gardeners are we, who have lost our flowers
And stand upon a star, that shines
And we weep.

The very images engage in a verbal struggle for victory — blossoms with tear, lightning with grief, star with weep — with no assurance of which will win.

But no single poem speaks for Nelly Sachs; she positions herself on the edge of her created universe and shifts her vantage point not in search of final truth but of multiple visions. She will not permit hope to supplant despair or despair to cancel hope.

Since for her the Holocaust has negated the simple logic of spiritual progress which the religious view of reality has governed for centuries, "yesterday and tomorrow" no longer represent sequence, but simultaneity.

We exist in a world that, with her fondness for noun fusions like "stardeath" (sternod) and "blackmoon" (schwarzmond), Sachs might have called "deathlife." This is one feature of her art that gives her voice its contemporary relevance. Like us, she inherited a history whose darkness does not dissipate with the daily rising of the sun. "Death" and "night" are not merely her favorite metaphors; they literally describe the fate of her fellow Jews, defining the terrain the imagination must cross in its efforts to restore to mankind a sense of justice and dignity and support for the continuity of human life.

For Sachs, we survive the memory of annihilation not by avoidance, but only by "seeing" into and through the darkness that surrounds it: the poet's images are indispensable signposts toward such insight.

Bereft of spirit for the time being, her universe is still inhabited by words, though their proper use — or their misuse — is determined only by their users.

In a poem addressed to "peoples of the earth," Sachs warns those who climb into the confusion of language — their legacy from the genocide — "as into beehives/to sting and be stung/in the sweetness." Misplaced optimism is no more serviceable than misplaced scorn, against which she also cautions the "peoples of the earth."

"Do not destroy the cosmos of words/ do not dissect with the blades of hate/the sound, born in concert with the breath."

Experience has caused purity of intention to dissolve into ambiguity; a restored trust in the accuracy of words must precede faith in the human values they express or the benign actions they may inspire: "O that no one mean death," she pleads, "when he says life/and no one mean blood when he speaks cradle..."

Were she alive today, she might add to this vocabulary of entreaty that no one mean "war" when he speaks "liberation" or "dying young" when he says hero or martyr. The alarm about misnaming did not perish with Nelly Sachs or the Holocaust.

Dying always involves a form of farewell between mourner and victim (whether of disease, old age, accident, or some other cause), and there is some solace to be found in the mere presence of both during the final moments of life. In the poem Parting (Abschied) we respond to "a word bleeding from two wounds," the familiar references just mentioned from the world of Sachs's pre-war "yesterday" and the grim legacy of the Holocaust "departed."

Two hanging tatters /and human hair in a clutching hand /that grasped.

Death by genocide creates a climate of difference for both mourner and victim:

And we who bleed afterwards —
fatally bleeding of you —
We hold your source in our hands.
We legions of those taking leave who build on your darkness — till death says: be quiet — yet here is: continue bleeding.

The poem, the last of a cycle called Survivors, forces us to consider how closely allied to the survivor's experience is the need to redefine the words used to describe it. If "farewell" in a Holocaust context is a spare, haunting epiphany of rags and clawing limbs, this is only to confess that today's bleeding memories cannot staunch their hemorrhage of pain with yesterday's verbal tourniquets.

It is as if the soul has gone into hibernation, while the cave that keeps it warm is lined with the unforgettable portraits of victims. Between spiritual vision and historical truth hangs a veil of uncertainty; in such a floating cosmos, interrogation replaces firm belief.

Sachs begins one poem, "who knows where the stars stand/in the creator's order of grandeur/and where peace begins...?" Milton and Dante would not have had to ask such questions. In these epics, divine love and justice exert firm control over the unfolding action, but the ravages of mass murder have reduced their appeal to fragile queries like the following:

If the prophets should stand up in the night of mankind like lovers, seeking the heart of the beloved, night of mankind
would you have a heart to bestow?

Once again, the dark night of the Holocaust looms between extinction and renewal, a negation so pervasive that it threatens to wither the arteries of feeling through which once flowed the ardent blood of faith and affection.

To the end of her life, Nelly Sachs refused to lapse into nihilism or despair, but she insisted that we be absolutely honest about the terms on which we accept our continued existence.

Unlike Dante or Milton, her verse is not a prelude to a more glorious ascension, but a reservoir of human anguish where all immersions of the modern spirit must begin — an uncongenial baptism that taints the promise of transcendence.

Sachs fixes Shai Agnon's bow tie prior to their receiving a shared Nobel Prize for Literature in 1966.

> To the end of her life, Nelly Sachs refused to lapse into nihilism or despair

If she continued to yearn for a resurgence of human community, she knew her vision would have to include "the child/who as in play was thrown into the playing flames." The lines are from a poem called Death still celebrates life, reminding survivors of their dual inheritance: that they have endured, and what they have endured. The legacy is the reader's as well.

Lawrence L. Langer is the author of The Holocaust and the Literary Imagination and Holocaust Testimonies: The Ruins of Memory.

Teacher to all

[Nechama Leibowitz]

"There was a woman in the land of Israel, in the holy city of Jerusalem, known as Nechama, a decent and worthy woman. Nechama spent her entire life immersed in study of sacred texts. She was destined to revolutionize the study of Biblical commentaries. This revolution did not take place in the lecture halls of the academy, but rather in classrooms throughout Israel and the Diaspora, eventually engaging the minds of women and men everywhere. For those men and women for whom Mikraot Gedolot (traditional exegesis) became an integral part of their lives, the name Nechama Leibowitz became synonymous with parashat hashavua."

By Marla Frankel

Thus did Prof. Saul Leiberman, the great Talmud scholar, describe Nechama Leibowitz, when granting her one of the many prizes she would earn in her lifetime, among them the national Bialik prize (1983) and the illustrious Israel Prize (1956).

Nechama, (as she preferred to be addressed by students and colleagues alike), was a pioneer in her day. Arriving in Israel in 1930 with a doctorate in Biblical studies, a decade of teaching behind her and newly married, she immediately immersed herself in teaching.

Initially, Nechama taught in the Mizrachi Teacher's Seminary in Jerusalem, but her fame grew as she began crafting individual worksheets on the Torah portion of the week, which were mailed to anyone requesting them. These worksheets were tackled by students and teachers, farmers and soldiers, waitresses and nurses, judges and labourers throughout the yishuv, as pre-state Israel was called. Subscribers, religious and non-religious alike, enjoyed the weekly challenge and eagerly looked forward to receiving comments from the master herself.

For more than three decades, while teaching in seminaries and kibbutzim, in universities and in small groups in her home, Nechama diligently corrected devotees' answers, never tiring of this weekly personal correspondence.

Her knowledge was as vast as it was deep

Her questions were often provocative, articulating those a modern Jew might raise while perusing the weekly Torah portion. Was Sarai justified in harassing Hagar, who provided Avram with child? What is the true nature of a man of faith? To what extent is man responsible for his fellow man? What were the leaders' roles (and responsibilities) in the sin of the golden calf? Why were sacrifices deemed a valuable form of worship? To what end were the chosen people chosen?

These issues and hundreds more were hammered out through rigorous analysis and close study of biblical, rabbinic and modern exegetical sources. By labouring over Nechama's worksheets, students became acquainted not only with the classic Jewish thinkers and writers of centuries gone by, but also with the thinkers, writers and exegetes who comprised the Jewish and general cultural milieu of her time.

For those who were privileged to know and study with her, Nechama was a giant: a woman scholar whose knowledge was as vast as it was deep; a charismatic teacher who captured one's attention and maintained it easily; a commanding presence whose classroom became her stage. Yet everyone in the classroom had an active part to play and each of her numerous students is convinced of having had his/her own direct relationship with Nechama.

How did a woman of the previous century manage to become the first female link in the chain of traditional Jewish exegetes, gaining a foothold in the world of Jewish scholarship? How did she succeed in teaching people from all walks of life and of different religious persuasions?

Waitresses boasted correspondence with her, but so did retired judges; orthodox teachers felt a kinship but so did the reform and conservative rabbis who gathered in her home on Rehov Hazvi (behind the central bus station in Jerusalem) to study her worksheets and compete for her attention. And finally, how did she become a role model for learned women in Bible studies and in fields far beyond, although she herself denied any affinity with feminist politics, and avoided feminist readings of the Bible?

The answers to these questions have been the subject of two major biographies and numerous scholarly articles. However, in the present context, Nechama's own personal story can shed light on some of these issues.

Nechama Leibowitz was born at the beginning of the 20th century in Riga, Latvia. In the religious Zionist home in which she grew up, the spoken language was Hebrew and not Yiddish, unlike most Jewish households of the period.

Although Riga possessed Jewish schools of various orientations (including an orthodox girls school), Nechama and her brother Yeshayahu, two years her senior, received home schooling throughout their elementary school years. Under the strict supervision of their father, an affluent merchant and scholar, both siblings received private lessons in general and Jewish studies.

Nechama's initiation into Jewish learning was not as occasional or haphazard as it might have been for most women of her generation. On the contrary, her father was committed to providing her with a comprehensive Jewish education, particularly in the area of biblical studies. He was known to engage the children in a weekly quiz that both siblings took very seriously.

In 1917, the Leibowitz family moved to Berlin. Historians of the Weimar period often portray the Jews of Berlin as citizens of the world, who embraced the culture of Europe in all its facets, learning its languages and adopting its discourse. The Leibowitz family, patrons of culture and knowledge, possessed a family library of books and music that reflected this breadth.

Between 1919 and 1927, five Jewish elementary schools were established in Berlin, as well as a Jewish high school for girls. Yet Nechama chose to study in the state gymnasium, receiving a broad general education while her brother, who was destined to become one of Israel's foremost scientists and philosophers, continued to receive private lessons at home until entering university.

During the same period, Nechama and Yeshayahu, were active members of the Blau-Weiss (Blue-White) youth movement, popular among middle and upper middle class Jewish families. Many assimilated youth found their way back to Judaism and Zionism through Blau-Weiss, furthering their knowledge of the Hebrew language, Hebrew song and Yiddish folklore in the outdoors.

Like many other upper middle class women, Nechama pursued a higher education, studying German and English philology as well as critical biblical studies at the universities of Berlin, Heidelberg and Marburg.

While at the University of Berlin, she enrolled in the Hochschule, an institute for higher Jewish learning and known for its excellence in the area of Jewish studies.

Although founded as a research institute, the Hochschule eventually became a seminar for teachers and rabbinical students. The faculty of the institute reflected a wide range of ideological and religious orientations of enlightened German Jewry, including observant and liberal scholars and Zionist thinkers.

By 1930 Nechama had already completed her doctorate on translations of the Bible in the 15th and 16th centuries into Yiddish.

Nechama's entire education, both at home and at school, is clearly a reflection of the path forged by Rav Samson Raphael Hirsh (1808-1888), who struggled to establish schools that offered equal education for both sexes, as well as a curriculum of general and Jewish studies.

Mordechai Breuer, a scion of the same community, claims that its members walked two paths. Opening the gates to emancipation, they allowed their children to participate unreservedly in the economic and cultural achievements of the modern world outside.

At the same time, they succeeded in providing their children with a religiously enlightened worldview. This allowed them to combine loyalty to tradition with spiritual openness and an ability to discern between the advantageous and the unacceptable in what the outside world had to offer.

Although Nechama straddled both worlds and was clearly a product of European culture and Jewish tradition, she never left Israel after making aliyah in 1930, despite many offers to teach abroad. Her commitment to the state was unrelenting and she beseeched her students to remain in Israel and contribute to the developing state.

Nechama died at the age of 92, giving classes in her home until admitted to hospital for the last time. Thousands attended her funeral and recited the mourner's kaddish in her honour, as Nechama bore no children to do so.

The only epithet she allowed on her tombstone, was the single word, morah — teacher.

A mainly forgotten writer

[Adele Wiseman]

Most of us Canadian Jews are recent immigrants or children of immigrants, striving to integrate our roots with this blessed country we now call home. Our Jewish-Canadian writers articulate this balancing act between tradition and modernism, home and exile, Jewish particularism and universal significance.

Michael Greenstein, in Third Solitudes, Tradition and Discontinuity in Jewish-Canadian Literature, observes that Jewish authors provide a unique critical perspective on the dominant culture that articulates both an inside and outside view. We have read the most renowned of our writers: A. M. Klein, Irving Layton, Leonard Cohen, and Mordecai Richler. Yet a mainly forgotten writer has captured the Jewish immigrant experience most powerfully and is worth revisiting: Adele Wiseman, who died at age 64 in 1992.

By Merle Gould

She describes in the opening chapter of her 1956 novel, The Sacrifice, the arrival in Winnipeg of Abraham, Sarah and their son, Isaac: "No matter what is done to the plant, when it falls, again it will send out the tentative roots to the earth and rise upward again to the sky. The boy was young, the boy was blessed, the boy would grow."

Wiseman was born in Winnipeg in 1928 to immigrant parents from Russia, and was raised and educated in that prairie city. Her first book, The Sacrifice, written and published when she was still in her 20s, became a classic almost overnight, and in 1956 won Canada's then-most-revered literary honour, the Governor-General's Award for fiction – our nation's equivalent of the American Pulitzer Prize.

Wiseman is usually not included in the canon of the best writing to come out of Canada because she reluctantly and slowly edited her work, and made the ill-chosen decision to write plays and non-fiction for much of her career – genres in which she never reached the success of her first published, internationally acclaimed work. Could the success of her first novel have flooded her with feelings of "too honoured/ too early/ too fast," which have crippled so many highly gifted men and women in the arts?

Wiseman did continue to create fascinating works throughout her life, even if she never reached the literary heights displayed in The Sacrifice. She wrote about her love of writing and struggles to achieve great art as early as 1947 in her correspondence with a close, supportive friend, someone who would become one of the most internationally honoured Canadian writers of the 20th century: Margaret Laurence, of Scottish-Irish, Protestant descent. Laurence's novels, The Stone Angel and The Diviners, are among the most treasured, widely read literary creations in Canada and around the world.

York University professor and Canadian literature scholar Clara Thomas has written: "The two women had already recognized in each other a total commitment to their careers and, even more remarkable, a total agreement as to a novelist's goals and responsibilities... They were joined by a passionate belief in the social value of art and in its deeply moral basis. In a profound way, they felt themselves as writers to be soldiers in the endless human crusade against oppression, injustice, and unthinking conformism to false values."

Both women suffered anxiety over their careers and lives. In The Selected Letters of Margaret Laurence and Adele Wiseman (John Lennox and Ruth Panofsky, editors, University of Toronto Press), it's interesting to read in the hundreds of letters sent back and forth between the two writers that the far less prolific and initially more successful Wiseman became essential to the growing success of Laurence: "One way or another, you're going to have to complete this novel," Wiseman urged her friend, referring to The Fire-Dwellers, which would become an important stepping-stone in Laurence's career. Thomas comments: "As Adele often said of herself, she was a natural optimist, with a bubbling sense of humour, and that was one of her major gifts to Margaret, who gradually became able to counter her built-in insecurity with saving laughter." Wiseman's own work is infused with a profound understanding of the complexity of human behaviour, leavened by her lively humour. While Laurence, moved from peak to peak in achievements, to become a giant of Canadian literature, Wiseman kept making wrong turns that prevented her from repeating her youthful breakthrough of The Sacrifice.

Novels take reader into complex world of relationships

Wiseman worked laboriously and with far fewer tortured "storms of uncertainty" than Laurence, although both women were equally hampered by what Thomas has described as "the crowding demands of teaching, children, family, friends and, as always, writing." Wiseman worked to support her writing as a social worker in England and as a teacher in Italy, even serving as the executive secretary to the Royal Winnipeg Ballet. There were years of travel and adventure, teaching at Macdonald College of McGill University in Montreal, where she met and married Dmitri Stone, a marine biologist, and happily mothered his three sons and their own daughter.

In Wiseman's latter years, she published an autobiographical work, Old Women at Play in 1978, in which she looked at her mother's doll making while speculating on artistic creativity and her own novels. Also in 1978, her play, Testimonial Dinner, was published. Her story for children, Kenji and the Cricket, was published in 1986. A delightful collection of essays, Memoirs of a Book-Molesting Childhood, was published in 1987. Her long play, Lovebound, revised by her endlessly, was never professionally published, and had to be printed privately.

Wiseman had difficulty following the suggestions of her editors, and endured years of rejections by publishers and false starts on various literary projects, before her second novel, Crackpot, was published by McClelland and Stewart in 1974, a full half-dozen years after the international acclaim she had received with her first book.

Crackpot is an intriguing, poetic, powerful story about an obese prostitute named Hoda. She becomes a legend in her neighbourhood, a canny and ingenuous woman, exuding a wholesome lust for life. It is richly Jewish in plot and theme, as its witty opening paragraph, which was printed entirely in italics, suggests: "Out of Shem Berl and Golda came Rahel. Out of Malka and Benyamin came Danile. Out of Danile and Rahel came Hoda. Out of Hoda, Pipick came, Pipick born in secrecy and mystery and terror, for what did Hoda know?"

For the paperback edition of Crackpot, Laurence, wrote an admiring afterword: "Hoda, the protagonist of Crackpot – earthy, bawdy, wise-cracking Hoda, is a prostitute. But Adele Wiseman's novel is no more a story simply about a whore than her first novel, The Sacrifice, in which the patriarchal Abraham finds himself killing a woman in an agonized parody of a sacrificial act, is a story about a murderer... And as one of the greatest characters of our literature, Hoda helps us more fully to occupy our own past and to inhabit our lives."

Wiseman's second major publication was critically applauded, but it in no way approaches the brilliance of her first. Both novels are on one level political, portraying a whole community, North Winnipeg, with its influx of immigrants, spanning the years from World War I to the aftermath of World War II.

On a deeper level, both novels take us into a complex world of relationships in which the tragic misunderstandings between people allow us to feel the pain and the interconnectedness of humankind enduring the burdens of ancestors and God.

What is so great, then, about Wiseman's most accomplished and acclaimed novel, The Sacrifice? Wiseman recreates, through the lives of Jewish immigrants in Winnipeg, the biblical story of Abraham and Isaac. The biblical parallels and echoes of the Jewish holy books in The Sacrifice are chosen with perception and used with remarkable skill.

Abraham, his wife, Sarah, and their son, Isaac, fleeing the pogroms of Ukraine, arrive from eastern Europe and settle in the Jewish ghetto of an unnamed Winnipeg, marked by a giant "Mad Mountain" – a physical phenomenon rare in the real Canadian prairies – echoing the Mount Moriah of the original Akedah. Abraham becomes a butcher, symbolically a job involved in daily "sacrifices."

Abraham explains to his grandson, Moses, about the archetypal sacrifice in the Bible: "In that moment lay the secrets of life and death, in that closed circle with just the three of them, with Abraham offering the whole of the past and the future, and Isaac lying very still, so as not to spoil the sacrifice, and the glint of the knife and the glare of the sun and the terror of the moment burning into his eyes... And God Himself is bound at that moment, for it is the point of mutual surrender, the one thing He cannot resist, a faith so absolute. That was the moment that even God could not resist, and so He gave us the future." But Abraham's son, Isaac, dies in rescuing a Torah from a synagogue fire, and later, after his wife also dies, Abraham takes up with Laiah, whom he eventually murders in a sacrifice to his own tortured concept of God.

In a mental asylum at the novel's close, Abraham is visited by his grandchild, Moses, a promising musician, and they reconcile: "When a human being cries out to you, no matter who it is, don't judge him, don't harm him, or you turn away God Himself." Moses expresses his love for his grandfather and they hold hands, linking grandfather to son to grandson, "their hands fused together – one hand, the hand of a murderer, hero, artist, the hand of a man." The immigrant generation has made sacrifices so that the children may prosper. In accepting the mystery of human life, Moses goes down the mountain back into the community, changed and matured, ready to engage in life.

Wiseman deserves to be read

John Moss, in his popular study, A Reader's Guide to the Canadian Novel, writes: "The Sacrifice overwhelms the reader with an aura of greatness... Wiseman's commanding vision of a devout man's exile from God, parallelled by the travail of immigrant experience in the New World, moves the reader to profound compassion – the whole is an awesome epiphany. As an example of immigrant fiction, The Sacrifice is without peer... Wiseman describes life in the ghetto with penetrating insight and a great deal of affection. She portrays the distortion of ancient and Old World traditions, the distress between generations imposed by the New World, the clash of opposing cultures, and the terrible threat and appeal of assimilation. Were there no more to the novel than this, it would be a major document...

In a mixture of dread and beauty, The Sacrifice takes in the secret thoughts of a tormented soul, the experience of a displaced people, and the whole of man's relationship with God. It has a spiritual humility as profoundly humbling as any in our literature."

Wiseman has created a complex allegory of spiritual crisis in which the immigrant, Abraham, while embodying the hardships of acclimatizing to Canada, personifies our mysterious relationship with God. For this one great novel alone, Wiseman deserves to be read. Panofsky summarizes, in Force of Vocation: The Literary Career of Adele Wiseman, that she was a writer "who doggedly and ambitiously perfected her craft, sought a wide audience for her work, and refused to compromise her writing for marketability."

A Jewish 'first lady of the land'

Portrait by Topley, circa 1920 courtesy of the Archibald and Lillian Freiman family fonds. [Ottawa Jewish Archives]

[Lillian Freiman]

Only the light of these your days,
Only the warmth of these your deeds,
Eternal sunshine from them speeds;
About them sunshine ever plays.

With these words, Canada's great poet, A.M. Klein, concluded his verse eulogy in 1940 for Lillian Freiman, unquestionably the most prominent Jewish woman in Canada in the interwar period. Five years earlier, when she was awarded the Order of the British Empire (OBE), the first OBE ever to be conferred upon a Canadian Jew, the Jewish Standard of Toronto called her the "Jewish 'first lady of the land,' " and so she was.

By Michael Brown

Today, memory of Freiman has dimmed. Her name lives on in the Lillian Freiman Hadassah-WIZO chapter in Ottawa, whose few members, all of them seniors, no longer meet formally. There is the Lillian Freiman Trophy established by her son and given every two years to an outstanding Canadian Hadassah-WIZO chapter. As well, she is one of seven (possibly eight) Jews on Parks Canada's list of 641 Persons of National Historic Significance.

The list includes some of Canada's foremost personages such as Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Emily Carr, Timothy Eaton and Billy Bishop. And it will grow longer, since people become eligible only after their 25 yahrzeit. But many of those persons of historic significance, like Mrs. Freiman, are now known mostly to history buffs.

In Israel, there are living testimonials to Freiman and her husband. Moshav Havatzelet HaSharon in the Emek Hefer near Natanya bears her name. Across the road is Bitan Aharon, named for Freiman's husband, Archibald Jacob or Archie. The proximity and the location are appropriate. For more than two decades, the Freimans were the power couple of Canadian Jewry, working tirelessly for the cause of Zionism. Lillian headed Hadassah-WIZO until her death, while Archie headed the Canadian Zionist Organization until his death four years later. Their son, Lawrence, also headed the Canadian Zionist Organization for a number of years.

The two were instrumental in raising the funds to purchase the Emek Hefer in the 1920s and to make it available for Jewish settlement. But as I discovered two years ago at a bat mitzvah celebration held in the catering hall of Bitan Aharon, not many in Israel know that the havatzelet (lily) was Lillian Freiman or that Aharon was the Hebrew name of her husband, Archie. They deserve to be better remembered, as both are of national historic significance in Canada and Israel.

She led battle against flu pandemic

Lillian was born in 1885 in Mattawa, Ont. Her father, Moses Bilsky, arrived in Canada as a teenager. He spent time in the gold fields of Western Canada and the United States and served as a union soldier in the American Civil War before marrying at age 46 and entering the lumber business in Mattawa.

When Bilsky's business prospered, the family moved to Ottawa where in his later years, Moses was considered the city's pre-eminent Jewish citizen. His wife, Berlin-born Pauline Reich Bilsky, was a homemaker. They had 11 children. One of their daughters, Lucy, married Allan Bronfman, who together with his brother Samuel, built Joseph E. Seagram and Sons, the liquor distillers and marketers, into a Canadian business colossus.

At age 18, Lillian married Lithuanian-born Archie Freiman, one of a very few Jews to found a major department store in Canada (Freiman's, in Ottawa, now a branch of The Bay), a sector of retailing that in the United States and Germany was dominated by Jews.

Ten years later the Freimans and their three children, Dorothy (later, Alexandor), Lawrence and Queene Esther (later, Luxenberg), were living around the corner from Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a grand residence originally built by one of the Ottawa lumber barons. A summer home at Meech Lake near the cottage of Prime Minister Mackenzie King was purchased later. After the First World War, a fourth child, Gladys (later Rozovsky), was added to the family. She was a war orphan whom the Freimans adopted.

Though not yet 30 at the outbreak of the First World War, Lillian quickly established herself as a civic leader in Ottawa. Her granddaughter, Betsy Rigal, says that Freiman worked tirelessly for the Great War Veterans Association, the forerunner of the Canadian Legion.

As a writer in the Jewish Standard said in 1934, she never "let the powers-that-be forget the returned soldiers' problems, nor did she cease pleading their case until...the country showed that it had not forgotten...the men that went 'over there.'"

Because of her work with returning soldiers, the Legion awarded her honourary life membership, and she remains the only woman to be so honoured. The first remembrance poppies were made in the Freiman home and she chaired the Legion Poppy Campaign until 1940.

Characteristically, Freiman did not concern herself with Canadian soldiers alone. Lawrence Freiman told of his mother's intervention on behalf of three enemy prisoners of war, deserters who had been interned in Canada. It is a story that resonates today.

After the armistice, the three were about to be deported to their home country where they would have been executed. Freeman pulled strings, using her Great War Veterans affiliation and her government connections, threatening the minister she would accuse the government of murder if the men were deported. She won their release and gave them temporary shelter in the family home.

Freiman also aided the war effort through her work with the Red Cross. A Red Cross sewing circle, which Freiman started in her home, evolved into the Disraeli Chapter of the Daughters of the Empire (IODE). At the same time, the energetic young woman volunteered with the Ottawa Juvenile Court, served as treasurer of the Ottawa Welfare Bureau, as president of the Ottawa Girl Guides Association, the Ottawa Day Nursery, the Perley Home for Incurables and as vice-president of the Ottawa branch of the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. She was also active in organizations such as the Ottawa Women's Canadian Club, the Institut Jeanne d'Arc for Catholic Girls, the Protestant Infants Home of Ottawa, the Ladies Auxiliary of Adath Jeshurun Synagogue and the Ladies Auxiliary of B'nai Brith.

Perhaps her greatest wartime contribution came during the flu pandemic that began in March 1918 and claimed 520 victims in Ottawa. Freiman was called upon by Mayor Harold Fisher to chair the city's battle against the deadly disease.

According to Betsy Rigal, Freiman oversaw the activities of some 1500 volunteers and worked with the city medical officer, the press and the municipal emergency services. She was instrumental in establishing an information bank and a registry for patients and volunteers, and she pioneered a press campaign to disseminate vital health care information. Her work brought her national attention.

There are those who believe that philanthropic work in the general community takes precedence, perhaps supersedes, working for one's own ethnic group. Lillian Freiman's love and loyalty and her sense of noblesse oblige were never parochial, but she believed that charity begins at home.

Believed in leadership by example

One of her immediate postwar endeavours was the campaign to bring to Canada as many as 2000 Jewish children orphaned during the war and in the fighting in Poland and Ukraine immediately after. Sadly, this effort foreshadowed the difficulties Jews would confront during the Holocaust.

As national president of the Jewish War Orphans Committee of Canada, Freiman ran up against Frederick C. Blair, later the director of the Immigration Branch of the Department of Mines and Resources. It is Blair who is credited with the statement that, regarding Jewish refugees from Nazism, "None is too many."

Blair was already employed at the Immigration Branch, and he was largely responsible for setting the quota for Jewish orphans at 200. In the end, less than 150 came to Canada, including Gladys Rozovsky, who, as noted above, was adopted by the Freimans. Mrs. Freiman believed in leadership by example.

Perhaps it was her experience of the pervasive Canadian anti-Semitism of the day, which, despite their wealth and accomplishments, affected the Freiman family, as well as other Jews, that motivated Freiman to champion the cause of Zionism. But whatever the reason, that movement seemed to arouse her strongest passion.

She attended Zionist conventions in Canada from the earliest days of the Federation of Zionist Societies. When Archie assumed the presidency of the Zionist Organization of Canadian, she became the organizing generalissimo of a national group of women Zionists.

Henrietta Szold, the founder of Hadassah in the US, had journeyed to Canada to help establish branch plants. Staunch Canadian that she was, Freiman steered the Canadians away from American Hadassah and towards WIZO (Women's International Zionist Organization), founded in England by Dr. Vera Weizmann, the wife of Chaim Weizmann, and others. Freiman felt that a British affiliation was more appropriate for Canadians than an American one, especially since Britain held the League of Nations mandate for Palestine. The Canadians tried to straddle the fence by taking on the name of both organizations of women Zionists. Szold, however, never forgave Freiman for what she considered an act of "treachery." Under Freiman's leadership, Hadassah-WIZO became the strongest Zionist organization in Canada.

Shortly after the war, Freiman helped raise money for the Helping Hand Fund of the new Canadian organization, the aim of which was to aid the struggling settlers in Palestine. Travelling the length and breadth of the Dominion, she raised approximately $200,000, an unprecedented sum in a community of 120,000 Jews, most of them recent immigrants of very modest means.

The campaign was also notable for the success Freiman had in soliciting contributions from non-Jews. During the '20s and '30s, Freiman traveled the country raising funds for Zionism. In 1934 she chaired the Dominion-wide United Palestine Appeal, which was launched by a coast-to-coast radio address by Premier Bennett.

In April 1934, she chaired a one-day appeal to aid German-Jewish refugees seeking to settle in Palestine. Under her leadership, Hadassah-WIZO supported the Youth Aliyah movement to rescue German-Jewish young people and resettle them in Palestine. Youth Aliyah was spearheaded by American Hadassah and overseen in Palestine by Henrietta Szold.

Sometimes Freiman's name alone was sufficient to elicit contributions. In 1935, when she turned 50, she was presented with $50,000 by Canadian Hadassah-WIZO "for the furtherance" of the group's "work in Palestine." On that occasion, the Jewish Standard reported that more than 1000 people were expected at a dinner honouring her at the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa.

A contemporary of Mrs. Freiman described the progress of Hadassah-Wizo under her leadership:

"Ladies first, in ordinary parlance, has become merely a form of courtesy, a sort of graceful tribute to the feminine frailty of women. But these two innocent looking words take on an entirely different meaning when spoken in certain Zionist circles. [There they]...are a tribute not to feminine frailty but to feminine ingenuity."

Staggering as the organizational energy and activities of Lillian Freiman may appear, her menschlichkayt, her concern for individuals, her "still small voice," seem even more impressive.

Freiman was never so busy with her causes that she could not find time for individuals who sought her aid. She always made time to help people in need: a woman whose son was convicted of a crime, people requiring transportation to visit relatives hospitalized in other cities, orphans, demobbed soldiers, enemy prisoners of war, the needy of all sorts. And from all reports there was always time for family, as well.

It is likely that Freiman's multifarious activities, public and private, cut short her life. In her final years, she was often confined to bed, although a bedside telephone (not common in the 1930s) enabled her to carry on despite declining health. At her death in 1940, she was only 55 years old.

Lillian Freiman was, indeed, the foremost Jewish woman of Canada in the interwar period. It would not be exaggerating to say that she is one of the most notable Jewish women of Canadian history, notable for achievements in communal affairs, Jewish and general, but notable most of all for her humanity. Her good works still spread "eternal sunshine," as A.M. Klein put it. We would do well to remember her.

Michael Brown is professor emeritus of Jewish Studies at York University and the former director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Historian whose task is remembrance of the Holocaust

[Rachel Kostanian]

When Rachel Kostanian speaks, the words come tumbling out so quickly one wonders how she has time to breathe. And what this 80-something, fiery-haired historian lives and breathes is remembrance of the Holocaust. Her field is Lithuania, her focal point Vilnius – Vilna or Vilne to the Jews, and Rachel brings the story to life as she describes each alleyway, doorway and window that mask the fate of Vilna's Jews.

By Esther Goldberg

Rachel chronicles each step along the journey. Here is the doorway where the Jews of Vilna gathered to beseech Jacob Gens, the elder of the Ghetto Jewish Council, for the lifesaving slips of paper that qualified the bearer for work, as the colour of the paper changed and the quantity was reduced.

There is the alleyway leading to the prison where Vilna's resistance commander, 36-year-old Yizhak Wittenberg, spent his last night, having given himself up to the Germans in the deceptive belief that doing so would save the ghetto.

Nearby are the windows of the Mefitze Haskole on Strashun Street, where Herman Kruk created a lending library and led the celebration on Dec. 13, 1942, when book number 100,000 was taken out.

Rachel Kostanian has investigated each event and every place. History and geography are woven together as a doorway or a hidden corner inspire a torrent of words in Russian, Yiddish, Lithuanian or English.

In Rachel's voice, the stones themselves cry out. "I feel the shadows of those who perished," she notes. Through her, they come to life.

An only child in a loving and educated Bundist family, Rachel first experienced anti-Semitism when the son of her family's Lithuanian housekeeper greeted her each day with taunts and stones. She was filled with shame, but finally got the courage to shout back at him.

After the June 1940 Soviet occupation, Rachel's father Yosif Zivelchinski, a lawyer, became chief judge for their town of Siauliai (Shavli) and the surrounding areas. With the German advance into Lithuania in June 1941, Rachel and her mother, Bluma, were sent with the families of other officials into the Soviet Union, settling in Gorky. Yosif returned to Shavli. Rachel and Bluma learned later that he was killed by German paratroopers.

In Gorky, Bluma and Rachel survived amid the deprivations of Soviet wartime existence. Rachel was sent to a kinderheim in the Ural Mountains, where 200 Lithuanian children, some of whom were Jewish, found refuge.

There, with the help of the Jewish director, the children followed on a large map the advance of the Red Army and escaped into music to forget their hunger, lice and the worry about their families.

At the end of 1944, with the Red Army advancing westward, the children were put on trains to return to Lithuania. Rachel got off in Gorky and was reunited with her mother.

With liberation, Vilnius again became the capital of Lithuania, having been part of Poland since shortly after the end of the First World War.

The murder of Vilna's Jews in the Soviet-dug fuel pits in the forest of Ponar, the murder of the Jews of Kaunas (Kovno) in the 19th century fortresses that ring the city, most notably the Ninth Fort and the 245 mass murder sites throughout Lithuania, were the remains of Lithuania's 600-year-old, devout and enlightened Jewish community. With Lithuania's postwar incorporation into the Soviet Union, the murdered Jews of Lithuania were included in war memorials as Soviet Citizens, not Jews.

'All of a sudden, I found my roots'

Reunited with her daughter in Gorky, Bluma was prepared to stay in Russia. It was Rachel who persuaded her that they must return home to Lithuania. Eventually Bluma found work in Vilna as the director of a library and she and Rachel were given a small room in the library corridor. Rachel not only lived in the library, she lived with the library. It was there, she remembers, "the greatest writers in the world became accessible and enriched my mind and formed me."

Rachel finished school and graduated from Vilnius State University having studied Soviet law. She began her lecturing career speaking in barbershops on the Soviet constitution, while working as a cleaner in the library and later as a junior librarian.

Despite her law degree, due to anti-Semitic attitudes she was never able to work in law, except as an aid to the dean of the criminal law faculty.

She spent evenings studying English and qualified to study English at the State Pedagogical Institute, when she met her husband Genrich, an electrical engineer. Like others, he had been sent from the Soviet Republic of Armenia to Lithuania, where there was a shortage of professional engineers.

Genrich had promised his mother to bring his bride to Armenia, so the couple spent four years in Kirovakan. During this time their son was born. Rachel returned to Lithuania for the birth and brought her mother back to Armenia, where Rachel taught English in a music school. "I would dance and sing with the children in English."

Rachel's homesickness for Lithuania won out in the end. In 1960, the family returned to Vilna. Still unable to get work in law, she got a job as a translator in her husband's factory. From 1969, she translated technical journals at a welding institute.

In 1987, everything changed. One day while walking in Vilna Rachel saw a large Magen David on an advertising pole. Her first thought was: "My God, they are taking us to concentration camps again!" It was a horrific moment.

"In a couple of seconds during which I saw trains packed with people, barbed wire on the windows, and so on, I saw — it is a Jewish exhibition! In Kaunas!" On opening day, "the train from Vilna to Kovno was packed with our people rushing to the miracle." The miracle that Rachel found was that she was no longer alone: "All of a sudden I found my roots. Like everyone else, I have a people, a language, a culture."

The exhibition had its origins with Emanuelis Zingeris and his brother Markas, children of survivors from Kovno. Emanuelis was active in the Lithuanian independence movement, and later served for 18 years in the Lithuanian parliament.

At Vilnius University, Emanuelis had written his dissertation on Lithuania's Jewish cultural heritage, a courageous act in those dangerous times. Discovering and promoting that cultural heritage became his life's work.

In 1989, as part of the Perestroika plans for the new Lithuania, the Lithuanian Soviet government asked each minority to set up a cultural foundation and provide a list of its needs. Emanuelis, with other Jewish intellectuals, established a Jewish Cultural Society and asked for the recreation of the Jewish Museum, commemoration of the Shoah, streets named after known Jews, plaques to be put up on former Jewish historic sites and the Jewish cemeteries to be put in order. All these were accepted by the government. Having volunteered to help Emanuelis, Rachel left her translating job and became the full-time scientific secretary of the Lithuanian State Jewish Museum.

Abraham Sutzkever and Shmerl Kaczerginsky, poets in prewar Vilna, had hidden valuable documents and archives in the ghetto and outside it. Having survived with the partisans, in 1944 to 1945, they recovered these archives and set up a Jewish Museum. Within four years the museum was closed by the KGB. Some of the material Sutzkever and Kaczerginsky collected went to YIVO in New York; some was taken over by the Soviet authorities, but still carries a Jewish Museum stamp.

In 1989, Emanuelis Zingeris secured a premises for the new Jewish Museum in a small wooden building that had formerly belonged to the Museum of the Russian October Revolution of 1917.

Rachel's husband Genrich designed the displays, which were assembled by Genrikh Agranovski, and with help from survivors Rachel Margolis, Dimitrij Gelpernas, Eugenija Biber and Rachel Kostanian, the Green House on Pamenkalnio Street was established.

The force behind the Holocaust Museum was the survivors. As Rachel says, "we all burnt with a desire to establish an exhibition so the world would know, in particular the locals would know what it was, what was done and what was the result." Today it is known as the Holocaust Exhibit or Catastrophe (Hurban).

The Lithuanian government returned two further buildings to the Jewish community: the former Tarbut Gymnasium on Pylimo Street, which today houses the Jewish community offices, museum, archives and a Gallery of the Righteous and the former Jewish Theatre on Naugarduko Street, which today houses the Tolerance Centre. Together with the Green House Holocaust Exhibit, the three make up the Vilna Gaon Jewish State Museum.

Material was collected for the Green House displays from three main sources, all of which Rachel and her colleagues pored over and which she absorbed as she had absorbed the library in her youth.

They studied Leyzer Ran's three volume history of centuries of Jewish life in Vilna, Jerusalem of Lithuania, based on the photographs he took of several thousand Jewish places and objects after the war.

They collected the memoirs and the memories of survivors "who started to glue to us," who returned to the museum daily to talk of their experiences. Also, the Lithuanian State Archives opened their treasures – documentation hidden up to 1988 – from German, Lithuanian and Polish sources, along with the remains of the Sutzkever/Kaczerginsky collection. The museum staff copied as much as they could, fearing that – like the Jewish Museum after the war – the openness would soon end.

With this archive-based documentation, the seven rooms of the Green House were filled and the museum opened in 1991, 50 years since the German invasion.

Its character shines through in the survivors who accompany visitors. At first, Rachel Margolis did this, then she suggested that Rachel Konstanian take over.

Four thousand to 6,000 people visit the Green House every year; many are moved by Rachel's descriptions of what they are seeing. Some visitors are Lithuanian schoolchildren, some are overseas scholars, some are South African, Israeli, British and North American Jews looking for their roots and the fate of their families.

One woman came to Rachel and said: "Let us go to the forests. I have to find the place where we were shot." As well as the mass murder sites, Rachel and her staff found Jewish tombstones and lobbied for the municipalities to clear and maintain the cemeteries. This was done and monuments were put up at each mass murder site showing the numbers of people killed there.

Great Britain's Lord Janner organized funding to put markers along the highways with arrows pointing to the sites in the forests. With their research and their colleague Joseph Levinson's travels throughout Lithuania, the museum published The Valley of Sorrows on the mass murder sites.

Among the discoveries in the forest was a small medal, inscribed in Yiddish to Noah Shneidman to honour his 20th boxing fight, with the date of the fight, May 18, 1943 and the Vilna Ghetto symbol.

Leaving his boxing medal with his family, Shneidman escaped from the ghetto two weeks before its final liquidation, joined the partisans in the forests, and survived. Sixty-seven years later, Norman Shneidman is professor emeritus of Russian Literature at the University of Toronto. His medal has been returned to him.

Teaches with a clear and passionate voice

In 2000, Rachel gave a paper at the Remembering for the Future Conference in Oxford. Organized by Dr. Elisabeth Maxwell, it brought together scholars, survivors and teachers, among them Fumiko Ishioka, en route to Theresienstadt to discover the owner and family of Hana Brady and her suitcase and Judy Cohen, who came from Toronto, and was interested in women in the Shoah.

Two years later, Rachel's paper was published as the book Spiritual Resistance in the Vilna Ghetto. It describes the areas of health care, culture, art, science, music, sport and religion that helped the Jews of the ghetto overcome and survive the physical and psychological terror.

A discovery by the museum's staff in the Vilna archives of posters of cultural and artistic events in the ghetto led to searches for where the events were held and the fate of those mentioned on the posters.

Rachel's book, Vilna Ghetto Posters, as well as the exhibit at the Green House, show the range of cultural activities — including a lottery to raise money for the Winter-Help Campaign, which kept the Jews alive while their food and medicine was scarce and families and friends were being taken away and shot.

For those in the west, the Holocaust took place far away; in Europe, the locations are still there. In Lithuania, a site of the mass murder of Jews may be only a few kilometres from a local school or church.

Lithuania lost as large a percentage of its Jewish community as any country in Europe, yet having been subjected to Soviet rule for 40 years, it is that Soviet-era trauma that is fresh in their minds. They view the Jews as those who met the Soviet occupier with flowers – not unlike the Jewish perception that the Lithuanians met the German occupier with bread and salt. History is still fresh and vivid in that part of the world.

As well as being the story of Jewish death and suffering, the Holocaust is a story of resistance to evil, living in dignity, maintaining civilization amidst chaos and uberleben – survival.

Historians such as Rachel Kostanian put a human face on the facts, making the lesson universal. She has twice returned to live in her beloved Lithuania when she was living elsewhere. A Lithuanian patriot and a Jew, she has been behind many of the museum's important works, a historian who teaches with a clear and passionate voice that resistance to evil, to silence and to falsehood is what marks out a hero.

Twenty-five years ago, we in Canada would never have believed we would walk the cobblestone streets of Vilna and Kovno, attend Shabbat services in shul there or visit a Jewish museum. Just as the prewar Yung Vilne writers were the apex of their literary world, Rachel and her team are the alte vilne, whose research into Lithuania's Jewish history and heritage, and the teaching of it, will benefit not only the present but those generations who follow.

Nitza Spiro of the British Spiro Ark cultural centre, who took Rachel's tour of Vilna and the Green House 20 years ago, wrote: "Rachel, petite in size, has become a real giant with her personality, encyclopedic knowledge, deep emotional contact with the subject and her passion for the long story of her people in Lithuania and for education.

A proverb in Hebrew says, "Dvarim hayotzim min halev, nichnasim el halev" – "words that come from the depth of one's consciousness, penetrate to those who hear them."

This has been Rachel's gift to those who know her, have heard her lecture, read her books and have seen her museum. It has become her gift to us all.

Yiddish poet, essayist and story writer

[Rokhl Korn]

The years after the Second World War and the post Holocaust exodus of Jews from Europe brought a host of poets and writers to Montreal.

The most prominent of those who came in 1948 was Rokhl Korn, short story writer, poet and essayist. Her arrival was greeted with joy and anticipation by a large group of Yiddish writers and intellectuals from across Canada and the U.S. who knew her and her work from before the Second World War.

In an enthusiastic article in the Keneder Adler in 1948, the most well-known of Montreal's Yiddish poets, J.I.Segal wrote: "This is possibly the first time in the history of Yiddish cultural life in Montreal and perhaps the first time in the entire history of Yiddish Literature, that a Yiddish poet is greeted by so many well-known colleagues with such excitement and wonder."

Segal heightens the once-in-a-lifetime character of this event and invites his readers to share in the celebration of Korn's achievement as a writer of poetry and prose.

Praising her unique talent as a Yiddish woman poet in a field dominated by men, he also underscores her miraculous survival in the face of her wartime experiences fleeing the Nazis.

He ends the article stressing the value of her work as a living link to the European world that was destroyed. He says he hopes that the arrival of a poet with such an established international reputation will bolster Montreal as a centre for Yiddish literary activity in Canada. Segal was not disappointed.

By Esther Frank

As the enthusiasm at Korn's arrival in Montreal attests, by the 1940s Korn's work was widely known to Yiddish readers. She had achieved a literary reputation in Poland in the interwar years, and was recognized by Yiddish literature's most distinguished critics for her innovative focus on the Polish countryside, on non-Jewish and Jewish peasant life and on nature and erotic love.

In the 1920s and 30s, these themes were refreshing features brought to lyric poetry largely by Yiddish women poets. They were viewed as heralding the renaissance of modern Yiddish culture in Poland, where, though it may be difficult to remember, a modern Yiddish literature flourished. So too did a successful Yiddish press and theatre, varying Jewish and Yiddish elementary and high schools, scholarly institutions and a body of literary criticism.

Korn was among those who made their literary debuts in Poland. Born in 1898 in East Galicia, she was raised on a farming estate called Sucha Gora (Dry Mountain), and felt deeply rooted to the Polish earth. She was tutored in the classics of Polish literature in addition to being schooled in Hebrew and some Yiddish.

Korn began her career writing in Polish in 1918. When the First World War broke out, she and her family fled to Vienna. They returned to Przemysl, Poland after the war and lived there until 1940. Tensions between Jews and their neighbors had arisen after the First World War with pogroms against Jews, and destruction of Jewish homes and upheavals of war shocked Korn. Still, she remained drawn to Polish literature and to Poland, vowing however, as a consequence of pogroms against Jews, never to write in Polish again.

Turning to Yiddish in the 1920s, Korn began to publish widely. Her first collections of lyrics and short stories Dorf, (1928) and Erd (1936) focus on relations between Jews and non-Jews in the Galician countryside. Made up of works she wrote in her first years as a Yiddish writer, these collections draw attention to the shared life of Jews and non-Jews in nature and depict the hard but sturdy life of those who labour on the soil and are nurtured by it.

Despite the impetus for her turn to Yiddish, Korn's early writings reflected an optimistic and fresh outlook on life. In 1939, all optimism vanished. In lyrical poems from the late 1930s visions of catastrophic foreboding begin to appear in her work.

In a poem about Poland in 1939 she writes: "I never knew I was a stranger to you, a guest who came to you for a mere 15 or 20 generations, for I grew up with your springs and summers, your forests, fruits and harvests...O Earth, if I will have to leave you for exile, every limb of mine and thine will feel the rupture, and bloodied will be you, my most beloved earth, and I and my song" (Liptzin, p. 456).

The Second World War sent Korn reeling thousands of miles. She and her daughter Irene fled to the Soviet Union and wandered there through the farthest eastern regions of Russia until 1944. These were years of hardship and sorrow.

In poems from this period published after the war, Korn writes of her awareness of her homelessness and of the homelessness of her people, and she weeps for her dear ones whose fate is unknown to her. Her poems she writes near the war's end after learning that all her kin has perished are the most moving of those dealing with the Holocaust.

In some her grief is overwhelming and her sorrow inconsolable. In some she despairs of her world, of the possibility of continuing to live and write in a world where so few remain alive. But in others, no less a product of her loss, she begins to find solace again in nature and in words. In these latter poems she struggles with the style and structures of the lyric and slowly begins to experiment with the language and its forms to find ways to convey the enormity of the devastation she experienced.

At the war's end in 1945, Korn once again returned to Poland with her daughter, but found it even more difficult to live there.

She found refuge in Montreal

Elected by the newly established Yiddish Writers' Union to be a delegate to the International PEN conference, she moved to Stockholm for two years and turned to prose to write about the experiences of the Holocaust. Her writings from this period appear in Nayn dertseylungen (Montreal, 1957).

Despite the hospitality she received in Stockholm, Korn wanted to leave Europe. In 1948, she was joined by her daughter and with the assistance of Ida Maze, a Canadian Yiddish poet living in Montreal, Korn, her daughter Irene — now a doctor — and her daughter's husband, Edmund Kupferszmidt, gained entry to Canada and settled in Montreal. Luckily, Korn, Irene and her family continued life together until Korn's death in 1982.

> 'The poet of sorrow and pain and the poet of longing'

In Montreal, with its large Jewish population (which peaked at 120,000 in the 1970s), Korn found a dynamic Yiddish creative life. For a time, the city welcomed varying populations each speaking — some say Babel-like — in their own tongue. Yiddish was heard, along with other languages, and was visible on signs in the city streets.

A host of Yiddish speaking immigrants who had come from Europe to Canada before and after the First World War established cultural centres for Yiddish. Despite a dwindling population of Yiddish speakers and readers, Yiddish culture was sustained by a number of intellectuals and writers who continued to write and publish in Yiddish through to the 60s and 70s.

When, after the Second World War, Korn and others such as Yehuda Elberg and Chava Rosenfarb came, they joined a still vibrant Yiddish community in Montreal.

Korn found refuge in Montreal, yet the anguish she experienced in Europe remained at the forefront of her writing. Poems of sorrow and pain appear in her collections published in 1948 and 1957.

From the '60s on, Korn's writings began to reflect calmer moods and themes. She introduced new landscapes of Canada and Israel, which she visited before and after the Six Day War.

Her later works offer insight into her rich cultural inheritance, which both in personal and collective terms enables her to find the appropriate literary register to regain confidence in the language and poetry itself. As she struggles to come to terms with her past, Korn's poetry moves toward an exploration not only of the physical world but of her own psychic landscapes.

The poems of this late period offer readers an inside glimpse into the sustaining power of language and the lyric poem. They shed light on the poet's ability to resist loss and systematic destruction through the power of the word and the structure of the poem. Calling her "the poet of sorrow and pain and the poet of longing," Elie Wiesel describes her work as moving her readers with the "evocative strength of her language. Each word calls out to us, each image burns."

Over these years, a tremendous outpouring of verse, essays, memoirs and short stories returned Korn to the literary productivity she had achieved before the war. She brought to fruition the cultural refurbishing in Montreal Segal hoped for in 1948.

Since the 1970s, Yiddish fluency in Montreal has declined. Korn's reputation also dwindled. Appreciation of verbal art in Yiddish has become accessible only to few, as Yiddish is less visible in the general verbal landscape of the city.

Recalling this lively culture has now become the work of translation and archival retrieval. Translations of artistic works by Yiddish writers have appeared in English and French.

A number of translations have awakened interest in Korn. In addition to the inclusion of her work in varying recent anthologies, translated works from Yiddish to English appeared by Seymour Levitan, Seymour Mayne with Rivke Augenfeld, Abraham Boyarsky, and others.

Since the '90s, translation from Yiddish has become a broad ranging activity involving historical research and critical and imaginative recreation.

A closer look at Korn's life and work is available in a large body of material in the archives of the Jewish Public Library. Most of it remains in its original Yiddish form. It would hardly be an exaggeration to say that much can be learned from Korn's oeuvre.

The rescuer

Judy Feld Carr

Jewish tradition accords priority to pidyon shvuyim, the rescuing of captives. The Shulchan Aruch goes so far as to equate any unnecessary delay in expediting the freedom of captives as equivalent to murder.

There are several cautions. We are advised that the price paid to free a captive should not be so high as to promote holding others for ransom, nor should individuals knowingly and repeatedly open themselves up to the possibility of captivity.

But these qualifications certainly did not apply to the approximately 6,000 Jews of Syria who, following the creation of the State of Israel in 1948 and, even more so after Israel's victory in the 1967 Six Day War, found themselves captive in the land of their birth.

Their every movement monitored and communication with Jews outside Syria restricted, Syrian Jews lived in daily fear of arbitrary arrest and torture and, on the slightest pretext, were squeezed by Syrian authorities into paying financial tribute. Remembering the financial squeeze put on the Syrian Jewish community, a former Syrian Jew now living in Israel recalled, "we paid for every breath we took."

By Harold Troper

The plight of the oppressed Jews of Syria was taken up by Judy Feld Carr. Beginning in the early 1970s and for almost three decades, Judy remained a mainstay of a public campaign in North America to promote the cause of Syrian Jews. She tirelessly pressed government officials, Jewish leaders and the media to speak out on the oppression of Syrian Jews. But, this was her public face.

Judy Feld Carr had a secret life that would rival anything that Robert Ludlum could invent. Put simply, under cover of her public protest campaign, Judy covertly organized the escape of more than 3,500 Jews out of Syria. Acting very much as an independent player in the shadowy world of international intrigue, she bought these Jews retail, one by one.

Was there anything unusual in Judy Feld Carr's background to prepare her for this task? Nothing beyond a Jewish heart and inability to take 'no' for an answer when it came to aiding Syrian Jews.

Judy was born in Montreal in 1938 and, together with her mother and younger brother, moved to Sudbury, Ont. — hardly a major center of Jewish activism — where her Russian-born father, Jack Lev, traded furs with Native trappers and served as a leader in Sudbury's tiny Jewish community.

Jews were for sale in Syria

After Judy finished high school in 1957, she left Sudbury to study music education at the University of Toronto where she earned both a bachelor's and master's degree in music education and musicology, a specialist in instrumental and vocal music. In 1960 she married a young physician, Ronald Feld. They had three children.

Both Judy and Ronald were engaged by Jewish life. In the late 1960s Judy and her husband were swept up in the Soviet Jewry campaign but eventually refocused on the increasingly difficult plight of Jews in Syria.

Convinced that the approximately 6,000 Jews of Syria needed the support of western advocates, the couple pulled together a Syrian Jewish committee in Toronto modeled on the effort being organized on behalf of Soviet Jews. The small group of activists around Judy and Ronald publicized the Syrian Jewish reality: extortion, imprisonment without trial and torture.

Judy and her husband also devised ways to pierce Syrian Jewish isolation, to let Syrian Jews know they were neither forgotten nor abandoned. Their committee began mailing packages of religious articles and books from Canada to Syria, items which the Syrian postal and police authorities allowed to be delivered. In the process, they made clandestine contact with several Syrian Jewish leaders, first in Damascus and later in Aleppo. Guarded and coded communication began, as did the transfer of money from Toronto to support individual Syrian Jews in distress.

Ronald died suddenly in 1973, leaving Judy with three young children. In his memory, family friends organized a charitable fund for Syrian Jews at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Synagogue. Encouraged by this generosity and as a tribute to her husband, Judy continued with the Syrian campaign she and Ronald started. Several years later, this work took a new turn.

In 1977, remarried to prominent Toronto lawyer and Jewish leader Donald Carr and mother to a blended family of six children, Judy was visited by the sister of an elderly Aleppo rabbi inflicted with cancer. The sister, living in Toronto, wanted to bring her father to Toronto for medical treatment. Would Judy help?

The idea seemed impossible. And if Judy had asked experts on Jews in Arab lands, they would have agreed it was impossible. Syrian authorities generally withheld permission for Jews to leave Syria. But Judy did not ask the experts and, intrigued by the possibility of actually removing a Jew from Syria, she accepted the challenge.

It did not take long for Judy to learn that Syria was a marketplace and Jews were for sale. If enough money greased enough palms, she learned it might just be possible to buy a sick and elderly rabbi out of Syria. She succeeded. He never went back. Nor did the more than 3,500 other Jews that Judy eventually delivered from Syria.

Encouraged by her first successful rescue, and backed by money quietly contributed in Toronto and elsewhere in North America to buy airline tickets and pay bribes, from her home in Toronto Judy soon began negotiating secretly with Syrian officials, even Syrian secret police agents, for the departure of individual Jews.

With every successful rescue, Judy was quietly approached with more names of Syrian Jews desperate to leave. With each new name she began yet another long and sometimes cumbersome rescue effort. Each case was unique. No negotiation was routine.

Since Syrians would almost never permit an entire family to leave as one, Judy was forced to bargain for each individual family member in turn. The amount demanded in bribes and fees varied from one rescue to the next: an old man generally cost less than a young and single woman, a little boy more than a little girl. How much for a pregnant woman? How much for a mother nursing a baby?

In addition to the bribes, Syrian authorities also required a fig leaf excuse for granting Jews permission to leave. Since each departing Jew left Syria with a round trip airline ticket and was officially supposed to return to Syria, Judy was forced to be inventive.

Some, like the elderly rabbi, were said to be leaving for medical treatment abroad and would return. Some left as caregivers for the sick, others for business trips or to visit family who had left Syria in the 1940s and 1950s before Syria's doors were sealed to the permanent departure of Jews. Each Jew allowed out also had to post a financial guarantee of his or her return, even though the Syrian authorities who pocketed bribes knew full well none of those leaving would return.

Most of those whom Judy Feld Carr bought out of Syria were first flown to New York. Those were reunited with relatives in the United States or elsewhere in the west. Others stayed in New York only long enough to camouflage a departure for Israel, where they were quietly resettled in spite of warnings by Syrian officials that if it was discovered that any Syrian Jew made contact with Israel, punishment would be visited on family members remaining in Syria.

In some instances it was imperative that an individual or even an entire family in immediate fear of the authorities be removed from Syria quickly. Often in these cases no amount of bribe money could induce Syrian officials to issue an exit visa. As a last hope, Judy entered the murky world of cross-border smuggling.

At great financial cost and even greater personal risk, she secretly engaged with shady individuals who, for the right price, illegally moved people and contraband across the heavily guarded Syrian border with Turkey. Once in Turkey, those Syrian Jews who Judy paid to smuggle across the border made contact with Israeli officials and were quietly transported on to new lives in Israel.

In the early 1990s hopes for a comprehensive Middle East peace, including an American-brokered peace between Israel and Syria, were high. With an eye to lowering barriers to bilateral talks, Syria and Israel both made goodwill gestures to one another. Syria, for its part, officially lifted state-imposed barriers to Jewish departures. But this did not stop Syrian officials responsible for issuing passports and exit visas from demanding a handsome fee for their services, often more than desperate Syrian Jews could afford.

Concerned that the Syrian door would not indefinitely remain open to Syrian Jews, Judy threw all her energy and financial resources into removing the remaining Jews from Syria as quickly as possible. The vast majority left, many with Judy's financial assistance. The Jewish presence in Syria, a presence that runs back to the era of the Babylonian captivity, came to an end. Today there are virtually no Jews remaining in Syria.

> Judy threw all her energy into removing the remaining Jews

Her Syrian work done, Judy emerged from the shadows to long overdue public recognition. Along with honorary degrees and accolades from Jewish and Israeli organizations, in 2000 Judy received an honorary doctorate from Laurentian University in her former home of Sudbury. In 2001 she was given the Order of Canada, the highest award Canada can give a citizen. A special honour came to Judy in the form of a letter. In 1995, Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin wrote Judy to personally thank her for her pidyon shvuyim, her work to rescue the Jews of Syria.

"Very few people, if any," Rabin wrote, "have contributed as greatly as you have." But, perhaps most heartening to Judy was an honour bestowed on her by leaders of the Syrian Jewish community she helped escape Syria. They collectively celebrated "Judy Feld Carr who arose when it was 'still night' and woke up the world to the plight of our brethren in Syria."

America's first female rabbi

Sally Priesand

In 1972, Sally Priesand became the first woman rabbi in America. Her historic breakthrough blazed a path for the transformation of modern Jewish life.

Changing the positions of women in Judaism had long been on the agenda of those seeking to adapt an ancient faith to the modern world. In America, starting in the mid-19th century, many synagogues abolished the separate women's gallery in favour of having the family pray together like their neighbors did in church.

Subsequently, the question of whether women could become rabbis emerged. In 1889, emblazoned across the front page of Philadelphia's Jewish Exponent, Mary M. Cohen dared to ask "could not — our women be ministers?" (then considered the respectable term for rabbi.) In the following decades, the question swirled among American Jewish men and women. In the 1920s a few young women tried to become rabbis, but none succeeded.

The winds of change for Jewish women blew not only in America, but also across the Atlantic.

In Germany in December 1935, one young woman, so pious that she would tie her handkerchief around her wrist on Shabbat, was ordained a rabbi — not by the authority of any rabbinical college, but privately by another rabbi.

By Pamela S. Nadell

Regina Jonas had been a student at the Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums, Berlin's College of Jewish Studies. There she had argued in favor of women's ordination in her thesis "Can a Woman Hold Rabbinical Office?"

After becoming a rabbi, Jonas preached and counselled Berlin's increasingly desperate Jews. Then she shared the fate of her compatriots. Deported first to the notorious "model" ghetto, Theresienstadt, in what had once been Czechoslovakia, she was murdered in 1944 at Auschwitz. The story of her breakthrough, however, did not perish with her, as Sally Priesand would eventually discover.

Spiritual gifts

After the Berlin Wall came tumbling down, Jonas's thesis surfaced in east German archives and is now available in English in Elisa Klapheck's Fräulein Rabbiner Jonas: The Story of the First Woman Rabbi.

Sally Priesand's journey to the rabbinate rests on the shoulders of those, like Jonas, who pioneered the question of women's ordination before her. Her success, however, belongs to her remarkable tenacity, her deep spiritual gifts, and also to the moment when she came of age.

Born in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1946, Priesand grew up in the settings of American reform Judaism — Cleveland's Beth Israel West Temple, its youth group and reform's Union summer camp in Zionsville, Ind.

Crediting her parents, who raised her to have the "courage to dare and to dream," she set her sights on becoming a rabbi before the second wave of feminism burst forth.

Even before Betty Friedan published The Feminine Mystique, exposing how bored were her Smith college classmates in their "comfortable concentration camp" suburban homes; even before a new generation of young women began demanding an end to the quotas barring them from medical and law schools, Sally

> 'Courage to dare and to dream'

Priesand's friends were already calling her "Rabbi Sally." Priesand later said that she never wanted to be a pioneer, and she certainly did not set out to champion women's rights. Yet in the end, she did both.

Instead, she wanted to be a pulpit rabbi. That meant heading to reform's seminary, the Hebrew Union College — Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JIR) in Cincinnati.

In 1964, Priesand, who had just graduated from high school, simultaneously enrolled in the University of Cincinnati and in neighbouring HUC-JIR's graduate rabbinical program.

In 1968, despite college officials assessment that they did not know what opportunities would be open for women in the rabbinate since they had never "as yet" ordained a woman, she was admitted to HUC-JIR's rabbinical school, the only female in a class of 35 men.

Some of her professors expected her to do exactly what some of the other women who had started rabbinical school had done. Either she would drop out of school and eventually find a "career" in Jewish women's work in Hadassah or another organization, or she would marry one of her classmates and instead of becoming a rabbi, she would have married one.

Priesand, buoyed in part by the first victories of the new women's movement which saw, for example, the elite Ivy League colleges begin admitting women while she was in rabbinical school, persevered.

During her final year she wrote her required thesis, choosing to explore the history and status of women in Judaism. Here, acknowledging Regina Jonas's pioneering achievement allowed her to claim that, since she "was not truly the first woman rabbi," she was not launching a revolution in Judaism.

On June 3, 1972, the young woman who had written when she was a high school junior, "although I am a girl, I would like very much to study for a rabbinical degree," was ordained rabbi, teacher, and preacher in American Israel, as her classmates spontaneously rose to honour her and acknowledge her historic breakthrough. Rabbi Sally had achieved her dream just weeks shy of turning 26.

But ordination was only the first hurdle for this reluctant pioneer of American Judaism. As a student, Priesand already discovered the rewards and frustrations that would mark her career as the first woman rabbi. Media attention had crescendoed as she approached ordination. But, as Priesand sought student pulpits and field experiences in congregations which regularly hired part-time rabbinical students, she discovered that synagogues refused to interview her — or interviewed her only for the novelty. Experiences with the media and in her student pulpits had already begun to convey what Priesand would soon describe as "the unbelievable and almost unbearable pressures of being the first woman rabbi."

She found her first job at New York City's Stephen Wise Free Synagogue as assistant and then associate rabbi. While there, she published Judaism and the New Woman (1975), a slight revision of her rabbinical thesis.

Introduced by Bess Myerson, the only Jewish Miss America to date, it laid out a program for achieving "the complete equality that justice demands" for women. But, in 1979, Priesand left that congregation when she was not promised that she would succeed its ailing senior rabbi.

Now, once again, she again found temple boards using gender as an excuse not to interview or hire her. Unable to secure a new position commensurate with her considerable experience, she was forced to take a part-time pulpit and work as a hospital chaplain. Not until 1981 did she find the synagogue home she had so longed for — at Monmouth Reform Temple, in Tinton Falls, N.J.

In the Emmy-award winning documentary And the Gates Opened: Women in the Rabbinate, Priesand talks on camera about her life and career. The film shows her cradling the Torah and leading services, images that, when she first became a rabbi, were so novel they were transgressive. Today, of course, such images are commonplace.

The temple was her family

The film shows her preparing young teens for bar and bat mitzvah and guiding a study session. She acknowledges how much women rabbis have impacted Judaism — introducing gender-neutral language, revisioning Jewish theology, favouring partnerships over hierarchy for rabbi-congregant relationships, reading ancient texts through a different lens, posing questions that had never been asked and inventing new rituals.

Priesand also talks frankly about the phenomenon of the "glass ceiling" in the Jewish community, barriers which still exist to women's advancement in Jewish life.

One way to understand her 25 years at Monmouth Reform Temple is to list the programs and causes she and her congregants championed, programs typical of so many contemporary synagogues — supporting Israel, caring for the homeless, sponsoring food drives for the hungry, hosting arts festivals. But this list scarcely conveys the person, the rabbi.

Priesand came to Monmouth Reform Temple and stayed for 25 years, despite the expectation of many that being a rabbi in a congregation of a few hundred families was surely only a stepping stone to a larger and more prestigious pulpit in a major metropolitan Jewish community. Priesand herself acknowledged the expectation, the sense held by so many that success could only be measured by numbers, power and location, and that she, as the first woman rabbi, had to achieve that. But she refused to tread that path.

Instead, at Monmouth Reform Temple, Priesand, who never married, came to cherish deeply the partnership she forged with her "temple family."

That temple family let Priesand implement her vision of a rabbi. As a student she had articulated her credo: "I believe that a rabbi is a scholar, a teacher, a preacher, a leader, a counselor, a comforter, a preserver of Judaism and a human being."

She came to her synagogue determined to live out her idea of the exemplary rabbi and refused to stand as the symbolic Jew for the congregation. Instead she demanded that she and her congregants embark on a journey to discover ways old and new to be Jewish together.

She encouraged them to take "responsibility for their own Jewishness, one mitzvah at a time," and showed them how to do so: to study Torah, to see Shabbat as a day "to re-connect with God, our people and each other" and to provide "provide a Jewish presence" beyond the temple's walls.

'We are partners with God'

Deeply spiritual, Priesand affirmed "we are partners with God in completing the work of creation." She committed herself and her temple family joined her in fulfilling "the task of tikkun olam (repairing the world)." Today, in retirement, Priesand gratefully acknowledges "the sense of belonging" she found at Monmouth Reform Temple and her affection for her "temple family without whom my life would never be the same."

Retirement is but the next stage in her life and career. By the time Priesand became rabbi emerita in June 2006, nearly 1000 women — Reform, Conservative and Reconstructionist — had followed the path she cut into the rabbinate.

Her colleagues in the reform movement Women's Rabbinic Network honoured her by founding the Rabbi Sally J. Priesand Visiting Professorship in Jewish Women's Studies at HUC-JIR.

Keenly aware now of how historic her breakthrough really was for the history of modern Judaism, she has taken the lead in asking the first women rabbis to join her in donating their papers to the American Jewish Archives so that the historian of the future may write their history.

For thousands of years Judaism had relegated half its people to the margins. Women's ordination signalled the end of that.

For those who think, as do I, that we are living through an unanticipated renaissance of Jewish culture and creativity, we cannot separate that renaissance from the admission of women into the public. For that, we have to thank Rabbi Priesand for paving the way so that others could follow.

Pamela S. Nadell is the Inaugural Patrick Clendenen Professor of History at American University and author of Women Who Would Be Rabbis: A History of Women's Ordination, 1889-1985.

Israel Museum renovates

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

A tawny sandstone sculpture of Nimrod, an ancient Hebrew warrior and hunter figure with a razor-straight back and proud stare, sits at the intersection between modern Israeli art and native art from Africa and the South Pacific at the recently renovated Israel Museum.

The 1939 sculpture by Israeli artist Yitzhak Danzinger is an example of the kind of cultural and esthetic contextual links that James Snyder, the Israel Museum director, hopes to evoke in the reopening of the museum following a $100-million facelift that he calls a "renewal."

"It's like a double helix," said Snyder, who came to the Israel Museum in 1997 after 22 years at the Museum of Modern Art in New York, whirling his hand in the air to mimic a double helix's shape. "The culture of the region and the culture of the world – they wrap around each other."

The museum now stretches out on its sprawling 20-acre hilltop campus in Jerusalem across from the Knesset as a sleek and, indeed, renewed version of its former self.

Streamlined and expanded with 204,500 square feet for its refreshed collection galleries, archeology, the fine arts and Jewish art and life are now easily accessible in one large exhibit hall designed with the guiding theme in mind of how objects and art can resonate across time and cultures.

The archeology wing, which traces the development of Judaism, Christianity and Islam, boasts a "House of David" – an inscription from the ninth century BCE seen as part of a monumental stone. It's considered the earliest source backing archeological evidence that there was a dynasty sprung from King David in the Land of Israel. On display for the first time anywhere is a rare Crusader-era fresco that was on the wall of a 12th century Jerusalem abbey.

Fewer holdings are now on display amid almost twice the space. And there is no more trekking up a long pathway exposed to a broiling Jerusalem sun by summer or the cold winds and rains of winter. Visitors to the country's largest cultural institution now reach the museum through an enclosed underground passage featuring a translucent glass wall on one side.

At the highest point on the museum's outdoor grounds is a gleaming 16-foot-tall stainless steel sculpture in the shape of an hourglass specially commissioned for the museum's reopening. Titled Turning the World Upside Down, Jerusalem, the work by the renowned Indian-born artist Anish Kapoor reflects, upside down, the city's skies and landscape.

"Jerusalem is all about a very special relationship between the ground and the sky. This work attempts to bring the two together," Kapoor said, describing the sculpture to the Calcutta Telegraph.

The museum has a 500,000-piece collection

Asked how he completed the massive undertaking of overhauling the museum both on schedule (three years) and on budget in a country where such feats rarely happen, Snyder answered, "Singlemindedness."

It was Teddy Kollek, also known for having a driving vision, who came up with the vision of the Israel Museum back in the 1950s. It was a time when most people in the fledgling state were focused on survival, not cultivating a world-class collection of art and archeology.

Under Kollek's guidance, the museum was opened in 1965, the same year he became mayor of Jerusalem, with modernist architecture designed by Alfred Mansfeld and Dora Gad. Under Snyder's direction, the original architectural sensibility was preserved as much as possible by the architects leading the projects, James Carpenter Design Associates of New York and Efrat-Kowalksy Architects of Tel Aviv.

"The point of our project is not about new architecture and re-engineering in the building," Snyder said in an interview with JTA in his sunny office. "The point wanted to be about changing the way you present content."

"The museum's view had been a little bit that we are many museums under one roof, and I kept saying what's amazing about this place is to find this breadth in one museum," said Snyder, an immaculate dresser who stands out in scrappy Israel with his rounded orange glasses, tie and blazer.

Over the years, the museum, which has active and generous friends associations abroad, has acquired a 500,000-piece collection. Along with its Judaica and fine arts holdings, the museum long has been known for its outstanding regional archeology holdings. A major showcase has always been the Dead Sea Scrolls, which are housed in their own building.

'It's all about cultural synthesis'

More than $80 million of the renewal project was raised privately in Israel and around the world through individuals, families and foundations. Another $17.5 million came from the Israeli government.

Defending critics of the museum's "universalist" approach, Snyder says, "How can you avoid it? Look where we are – in Jerusalem, at the crossroads of the ancient world, where Europe meets Asia meets Africa and where monotheism happened. So if not here, where?"

The Jewish art and life gallery is designed to provide a view of Jewish life from the Middle Ages to modern times, showing both its secular and sacred dimensions. A highlight is a new synagogue route, which has the interiors of four synagogues, including ones from Germany, Italy and India. The most spectacular of all is a newly restored 18th-century synagogue from Suriname, a tiny South American country north of Brazil whose Jewish community, of Spanish and Portuguese origin, took root there a century before.

In the 1990s, with the Suriname Jewish community rapidly disappearing and the synagogue no longer functioning, the Israel Museum acquired the synagogue and brought its interior – white walls, large windows and sand-coated floor – and contents to Jerusalem.

Upstairs on the upper entrance hall of the fine arts wing, a much different image looms. It's a towering sculpture of an African refugee boy in Israel made from Styrofoam and painted black. Israeli artist Ohad Meromi's 2001 The Boy from South Tel Aviv stands in front of a painting of different coloured polka dots by renowned English artist Damien Hirst.

Snyder thinks the sculpture of this underclass boy with a sense of majesty about him, as he describes it, has found its perfect home surrounded by the Hirst piece and others nearby that draw from African and European themes.

"It's all about cultural synthesis in contemporary culture," he said, his face breaking into a smile.

Then, adding what might be true for the renewed Israel Museum as a whole, Snyder says, "I hope we can keep it up."

'I, too now belong in Poland'

By CAROL SEVITT

"What took you so long? We've been waiting for you."

On a recent trip to Poland and Ukraine, these words uttered by an old woman in Terawa Woloska, Poland, pierced my heart. As a child of Holocaust survivors, I felt that it was time for me to walk the streets my ancestors walked, breathe the air that was theirs and see the sights and smell the smells of their youth. With my cousin, Rosalyn Golfman, and a childhood friend, Claire Hoffer, I joined a Jewish Heritage tour organized by the Taube Foundation in San Francisco that took us to the major places of Jewish interest in Poland. Afterwards, we went to visit our ancestral towns.

Terawa Wolsoka, a picturesque Galician shtetl in the foothills of the Carpathian Mountains, was home to the Langsam family, including my grandmother, great-grandmother, aunts, uncles and cousins. Tragically, most of the family perished in Belzec concentration camp, and I have only my mother's tales and two or three photos to verify their existence.

When my grandmother Shaindel married Zecharia Fink, they moved to Sanok, about 20 kilometres away, where they had five children. Born in 1923, my mother, Hania (Anne Novak), spent summers in Terawa Woloska running free on its hills and enjoying its quiet pastoral life.

Life changed drastically after the Nazis invaded Poland. The San River in Sanok was the border between the German and Russian-occupied parts of Poland. The Fink family escaped eastward and were evacuated to Siberia in 1941 as forced labourers. It seemed a cruel and unusual punishment at the time, but it saved their lives. During the war years, when they were starving and toiling in the forests, the family heard horrific stories about what was happening in Poland, but they couldn't believe anything could be worse than Siberia. Of course, they were wrong and soon learned that they had lost almost everyone and everything.

My grandmother's sister, Clara, who had come to Winnipeg before the war, sponsored all the surviving family members after it was over. Having been born in a displaced persons camp in Germany in 1948, I was only six months old when we came to Canada by ship and moved in with my aunt's family. It was very moving that 62 years later, Clara's daughter – my cousin – was with me on this historic pilgrimage back to Poland.

'Through my tears, I thought of the losses we suffered'

Accompanied by our affable and larger than life guide, Alex Dunai, we toured Sanok, now a city of 40,000, which had once been one-third Jewish. At 57 Slowakiego St., my mother's address, we found a new house that bore no resemblance to the one she had described. The child playing outside eyed me suspiciously as I photographed the property, the neighbouring houses and the street from every angle. We asked a neighbour if there were old people around who might remember the Fink family, but learned that the oldest woman had died a few years ago.

Next, we headed to the Sanok Jewish cemetery. Many Jewish cemeteries have painful histories, as the Nazis often dragged Jews there, forced them to dig their own graves and then shot them. They also removed most of the Jewish headstones to use as construction materials, so many Jewish cemeteries around Poland and Ukraine are now just barren grassy fields. Hundreds of tombstones had been removed from the Sanok cemetery, but 50 old sandstone and marble tombstones and a new monument remained. I had brought stones from my Toronto garden and lovingly left a few in honour of my ancestors who were buried there in unknown spots.

After the cemetery, we retraced my mother's annual trek to Terawa Wolsoka, but instead of taking a few hours by horse and buggy, we got there by car in 20 minutes, enjoying breathtaking vistas as we crossed the Slonne Gura mountain.

Shortly before my journey, my 87-year-old mother drew a map of the hamlet for me. All the relatives lived in and around the main street – her grandfather was a butcher, her uncle was a baker, others had little shops. The first landmark was a church on the edge of town, and just as she indicated, there it was.

Two older women walked by as we reached the church, and Alex asked them if they remembered the Langsam family. Their faces lit up – yes they remembered various people including Pinchas the butcher (my great-grandfather). They walked us around the town and enthusiastically showed us where various family members had lived and where the Jewish cemetery had been (no tombstones remained).

They spoke of the terrible times the townspeople went through during the war and of a Polish woman who had tried to hide a Jewish child, but got killed for her effort. In their excitement to share their stories with us, they revealed that we were the first Jews to come back since the war had ended. That's when one of the women said to me, "What took you so long? We've been waiting for you."

Through my flood of tears, I thought of the 70 years that had passed, the losses we had suffered, and the people who would never be able to return to their beautiful shtetl. My cousin and I left Terawa Woloska with mixed emotions – elated that we had found people who remembered our family, impressed with its natural beauty, but grieving for more than 60 family members who were never a part of our lives, except in sad whispers.

'I felt a sense of closure'

After seeing my mother's places, it was time to cross the border into Ukraine to visit my father's town. My dad, Oscar Novak, was born in 1920 in Stojanow, a shtetl about 100 kilometres north of Lvov (formerly part of Poland) with a population of about 2,000, half of whom were Jewish. Because he lived in the Soviet-controlled part of Poland, he was drafted into the Russian army in 1941 and stationed in Stalingrad at the start of the siege. After the attack on Pearl Harbor, the Russians began to distrust the Jews and sent my father to Siberia to join the industrialist army. There he found the conditions unbearable, and before long, he decided to desert. Unfortunately, he was caught.

The Russians decided to set an example, and after a show trial, sentenced him to eight years in jail, where he had to do hard labour. By 1945, near the end of the war, the Russian army had suffered so many losses that they began recruiting prisoners for suicide missions and promised that if they survived, they would be free. Fed up with his life, my father volunteered, but a kindly prison director wouldn't let him go, saying the war was almost over. By the time the war ended and he was freed, he heard the terrible truth that his entire family had been rounded up in Stojanow and liquidated in Belzec.

In 1946, he made his way to Breslau, Poland, and got involved in setting up kibbutzim to recruit Holocaust survivors to move to Israel. When he met my mother, he fell in love with her, followed her to the camp in Neu Ulm, Germany where she was living and married her in 1947. The following year, I was born.

While my mother constantly spoke about the war and her childhood in Sanok, my father never did. Whereas my mother is alive and helped me prepare for my trip, my father died in 1998.

As a result, I went to his town with very few details about Stojanow, his youth, his parents, his siblings, his life. Since I never saw a photo of my father's family, it was difficult to think of them as real people. To me, Stojanow was a name, and my ancestors were mere shadows.

Driving into Stojanow was very emotional because I felt that I was honouring the memory of my father, my grandmother Krusia, after whom I was named, and of all those unknown, unseen family members.

We found an 86-year-old woman who excitedly invited us into her apartment and plied us with coffee and chocolates.

Seviet in Stojanow in front of a Soviet war monument.

I had brought a photo of my dad taken right after the war, and when I showed it to her and told her his name, she told me that she remembered my father. She had played with him as a child, and knew that the family had run a store on the main street of town.

In that tiny kitchen, she told many stories about what had happened during the war, she laughed with us and cried with us. Then she looked up at me and said, "You look like your grandmother."

My eyes filled with tears as I thought about the woman after whom I was named, her tragic fate, and my loss at never having seen or known her. This woman hugged and kissed me and invited me to come back anytime and stay with her. Later, her daughter took us to the location of the Novak house and store on the main street, where the family of 10 had lived as part of this thriving Jewish community.

Back in Lvov (once known as Lemberg), which had once had a huge and vibrant Jewish community, the faded glory of the magnificent buildings harkened back to a prewar time when Jewish life in Poland was in its heyday. I could imagine all the rabbis, students, housewives, children, business and tradespeople who had once walked these streets. I felt the ghosts around me wherever I went in Poland and Ukraine.

Returning to Toronto, I felt a sense of closure. I had seen my family places, I had seen the major Jewish sites in Warsaw and Krakow, I had said Kaddish in Auschwitz. Although I will never fully make my peace with the Holocaust, a part of me feels that I too, now belong to Poland.

Jewish communities in Germany reborn out of the ashes

By MICHAEL PAUL

"Why would a Jew want to visit Germany?" Betty Barban asked me skeptically? At 97 years, she is the oldest member of the Jewish community in Newfoundland and Labrador.

She had a point, as she and her family and the parents of her late husband, Andreas, had to flee Nazi oppression in Vienna following the Anschluss (the Germany annexation of Austria into Greater Germany by the Nazi regime in 1938). The family ended up taking the last boat from Genoa to China and spent the next eight years in Shanghai.

I told Barban that I was fortunate to be able to attend a meeting in Munich, and while in Germany, I would also take the opportunity to learn more about Jewish life, past and present, in the areas between Frankfurt and Munich.

First, I decided to visit the areas of the "Shum" region, as it was called in Hebrew. Shum, when referring to the region, is a play on words. Shum, in Hebrew, means garlic. The Jews put garlic in most of their foods in the old Ashkenazi world of Germany, and in medieval depictions of Jewish men, they were drawn as holding a bag of money in the right hand and a bag of garlic in the left hand. Shum was also the acronym of the three famous places of Jewish learning in medieval Germany – Speyer, Worms and Mainz. In fact, Rashi spent some of his formative years in Worms and in Mainz studying at the famous yeshivas in those towns.

The ancient Jewish cemetery in Worms

In Mainz, Speyer and Nuremberg, I found few signs of Jewish life. Only the Judengasse, the Jewish ghetto, remained as a reminder of the once vibrant Jewish community in these places.

The town of Worms was a major centre of Jewish learning. Jews have been known to live there for more than 1,000 years. The old town, or Altstadt, is surrounded by remnants of the ancient wall and its towers. One tower near the old Jewish quarter is now called the Rashi Tor, in honour of the famous resident.

The current Jewish community complex in Worms includes the oldest synagogue in Germany (it was the first synagogue rebuilt in post-World War II Germany by the German state and federal governments), a mikvah and the Jewish museum. The latter was built on the spot where there had been a Jewish old peoples' home.

The Worms synagogue was initially destroyed in 1096 during the rampage of the Crusader mobs on their way to the Holy Land. The next destruction occurred in the mid-14th century, at the time of the Black Death, when the Jews were accused of poisoning the wells and causing the plague, and finally, the synagogue was totally destroyed in November 1938, leaving only rubble.

'In awe as I entered the cemetery's ancient section'

The rebuilding of the ancient synagogue was done in 1959-60, using fragments of the rubble mixed with new stone bricks. The reconstruction was based on the photos of the interior and exterior of the original structure. The shul's main body serves as the men's section, and the women's section is off to the left. Somehow, the famous Rashi Chair was saved. It is claimed that Rashi used this chair.

The Worms museum, run by the city government, exhibits artifacts of the city's former Jewish residents –their homes and businesses, as well as articles from the old synagogue. A short distance away is the old freidhof, or Jewish cemetery. The cemetery is surrounded by a high wall, and it's divided into ancient and modern sections. The latter is closest to the main gate.

I was in awe as I entered the cemetery's ancient section. The matzevot, or tombstones, are enormous, are of a red sandy colour and appear to be of substantial weight. Many of them are four to five feet tall. One could still make out the ancient Hebrew script and small decorations on the tombstones that were not covered with moss. Here and there were the symbols of the Kohanim, the priestly tribe, with the hands outstretched in blessing, the picture of a lion or of a deer, or other figures. Close to a path were two prominent stones upon which had been placed many pieces of paper with small stones to weigh them down. One was the stone of the Maharil and the other the stone of the Baal Shem. The stones in this section appeared to be placed in a haphazard manner, and many had toppled over. The next section had stones dating from the late 1700s to the early 1930s. Some of the monuments were ornate, while others were plain. Almost all of them were in marble. They gave a glimpse into the history of this remarkable Jewish community. Not a single stone had been desecrated by the Nazis during the entire 1933-45 period. The same could not be said of the Jews living in Worms.

Heidelberg on the Necker River was a centre of Jewish trade in medieval times. The community there shared the fate of other Jewish European Jewish communities during the Shoah. Heidelberg's old synagogue was located close to the Neckar.

In Heidelberg, only a Judengasse without memorial

The Jews were given a small portion of land close to the river, so they would suffer the most during the frequent spring floods that wiped out the entire Jewish quarter and ruined the trading assets of the tradesmen. There is a memorial square in Heidelberg with 12 small pedestals made of the stones from the ruined synagogue, to symbolize the 12 tribes. At the front of the square is a small bimah upon which there is an inscription in Hebrew to memorialize the destroyed community. There is currently a small synagogue in active use in the city, and the community is small.

I next travelled to Nuremberg, the city made infamous for the early Nazi rallies, the Nuremberg racial laws and by the war crimes trials that bears that city's name.

The University of Heidelberg was one of the first universities in the 19th century that accepted Jews on the faculty without their having to convert. Sadly, in the 20th century, the university was plagued by virulent anti-Semitism and was one of the first to expel Jewish students and faculty after the Nazi rise to power.

All that remains today in Heidelberg is a Judengasse, without any sign of a memorial to its former Jewish citizens. This is truly a sad statement, especially from a city so tainted by Nazism.

Regensburg on the River Danube was one of the few German towns not bombed during World War II. There is an active Jewish community in Regensburg today. The small Jewish community was revitalized by an influx of Russian Jews in the early 1990s. The Jewish community complex is surrounded by a wall on which there is a memorial plaque. On the wall opposite the front door of the community centre is a painting of the pre-1938 synagogue. I was taken to the current sanctuary. An Orthodox synagogue, it had a linen mechitzah and was designed in the usual Ashkenazi manner. The current rabbi, Rabbi Josef Chaim Bloch, was there, and he joined the tour, pointing many things out to me. In my Yiddish and in his German, we got along very well.

In the Regensburg Synagogue with Rabbi Josef Chaim Bloch.

The rabbi insisted on my coming to his family's apartment a few blocks away for some tea. On the way, he told me a few things about the community. The Russians who had joined the community posed some serious problems in terms of their Jewishness. There are many mixed marriages with children, and some people consider themselves Jewish but halachically are not. Another issue is that some members of the community have not been circumcised, as circumcision was not widely practised in the former Soviet Union.

Rabbi Bloch and others teach the children of the community about Judaism. He told me that when the afternoon school is in session, there is a police car parked in front of the building. He said that he has not experienced anti-Semitism in Regensburg, but the Jews are always watchful. The authorities are friendly toward the Jewish community. The rabbi, on parting, told me about another historical Jewish site in town – a low, white rectangular structure with the word "Mizrach" in Hebrew where the old synagogue's Aron Kodesh stood. This ancient site was uncovered several years ago.

The city of Augsburg is the site of many great churches and palaces. The Jewish community Gemeinde (official community) and synagogue are only a few minutes' walk from the main street in the Altstadt. This is a liberal community, similar to American and Canadian Reform communities. Sadly, the Augsburg community today is only a shadow of what it once was. Currently, few of the city's approximate 1,750 Jews are active in communal affairs. I was told this by the community's archivist, a man who was born in Italy but who also lived in Czechoslovakia and in Poland. The problem of "who is a Jew" is very prominent in Augsburg – as he told me that the community's definition is very lax.

For example, he claimed that the current chazzan is from Serbia, but it's believed that his mother is Christian and his father is Jewish. However, he's accepted by the rabbi and the community as being Jewish. The services are more than 95 per cent in Russian with only a smattering in Hebrew. Even though the services are understandable to the main constituents, no more than 30 or 40 attend Friday night services and about eight to 10 come on a Saturday morning. The building used by the Gemeinde not only houses the synagogue but also a museum, which is used by the city's elementary school and high schools to teach children about German Jewish history, especially Jewish persecution during the ages.

The final city on my trip was Munich. This is a city tainted by its association with the early days of Nazism, and by the massacre of 11 Israeli athletes during the 1992 Olympics. The city that was once almost Judenrein is now home to an active Jewish community that some estimate at about 10,000. Currently, there are three known synagogues – one shtibl, a shul in the Jewish section of the city on Possartstrasse and the main synagogue, Ohel Yaakov, in the centre of town. A new complex of three buildings connected by tunnels, only a few blocks away from the Alte Rathaus (old city hall), contains the Ohel Yaakov Synagogue, the Gemeinde offices and the Jewish museum/ kosher restaurant. The complex is guarded by the police almost round the clock and by several Israeli security men. The Gemeinde is open 24 hours a day, and to enter one must talk to the Israeli security person who sits behind bulletproof glass. The museum consists of three floors and includes a section on the history of the Jews in Munich, which dates back to about 1275, when Jews were first mentioned in official documents.

'Yasher koach to the Jews of Germany'

In order to enter Ohel Yaakov Synagogue when it isn't open for services, a visitor must undergo questioning by the security agents and present a passport. The tunnel to the synagogue contains memorial plaques and the names all of the Jewish residents of Munich who perished in the Shoah. When I was there, the staff was busy preparing the sanctuary, as on the very next day was to be a bar mitzvah. I met the shammas, a very charming man by the name of Erich Lehmann, who was originally from Mainz. He took the time to show me the Aron Kodesh with its eight Torah scrolls beautifully dressed in decorated donated mantles. What was very impressive was the ceiling made of Plexiglas to maximize the amount of light entering the room.

That evening for Shabbat services I had made arrangements to be with the Chabad rabbi, Rabbi Yisroel Diskin, who has been stationed in Munich for 21 years. He and his wife run the local Chabad House, which is across the hall in their apartment building on Princeregentsstrasse 91. The Chabad organization has about 10 houses across Germany, as listed on their website at www.chabad.org. Rabbi Diskin, his wife and his two young children were very inviting and kind. I joined the rabbi on the short walk to the Possartstrasse Synagogue. The ubiquitous Israeli security agent was present at the entrance but did not ask me any questions as I was a guest of the rabbi.

The people in attendance at the shul were in the main of Russian origin, with a smattering of former Polish residents. There was also an Israeli visitor. The interior was fairly simple. Rabbi Diskin led the Kabalat Shabbat services. We were finished by 9 p.m. As is the custom, the rabbi invited anyone who needed or wanted a place to go for Shabbat – an act of chesed. The rebbetzin had made a delicious supper, and the discussion around the table included chassidic stories about great saintly rabbis and the current state of political affairs.

As I was leaving, the rabbi reminded me that as a visitor to the community, I was invited to the bar mitzvah Shabbat morning at the Ohel Yaakov.

I arrived at the shul at about 8:45 a.m. Lehmann greeted me at the door wearing his top hat and high-collared shirt with cravat. Of course, there was a gold chained watch across the vest. The shul rabbi – Rabbi Steven Langnas – is originally from the United States, but has been with this shul now for 12 years. He has a very nice voice and started the psukei d'zimrah before the chazzan took over. The chazzan, a young man with a soft and melodious tenor voice, continued. The bar mitzvah boy did his chanting of the Maftir and Haftorah very well, after which everyone on the bimah was peppered with candies. Both the rabbi and the bar mitzvah gave short talks in German.

I happened to be sitting next to a man with whom I had a good discussion about the Gemeinde. He indicated that Jews who are members are taxed at a rate of eight per cent, half of which is deductible from federal taxes. He lamented the fact that many of the Russians and Israelis in the city are not members. After the services, we walked to the Gemeinde building where there was the buffet meal. The way was lined by some of the adults in the community singing mazal tov songs to the family of the bar mitzvah.

My brief and limited trip to Germany's Jewish communities has shown me how out of the ashes of destruction and annihilation a community can be reborn, with vigour and vitality. Yasher koach to the Jews of Germany.

Michael Paul is a physician who is an active member of Beth El Synagogue in St John's, Nfld.

Stop blocking inspectors, IAEA tells Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

VIENNA — The United Nations' atomic watchdog chief said Monday that Iran's decision in June to bar two experienced nuclear inspectors from the country is problematic.

"I learned with great regret about Iran's decision to object to the designation of two inspectors who recently conducted inspections in Iran," said Yukiya Amano, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

Repeated rejections of IAEA staff are hindering their work, he said.

Iran has accused the two inspectors of giving "false information" about its nuclear program. But Amano told a meeting of the IAEA's 35-nation governing board on Monday that he had full confidence in their "professionalism and impartiality."

The dispute over the inspectors has added to international concern about Iran's nuclear program, which western powers suspect is aimed at developing atomic bombs. Iran denies this allegation, insisting the program is aimed solely at generating electricity.

Apart from the two inspectors barred in June, Iran also refused access to a senior inspector in 2006 and has objected to a number of other appointments in the past.

"Iran's repeated objection to the designation of inspectors with experience in Iran's nuclear fuel cycle and facilities hampers the inspection process," Amano said, according to a copy of his speech provided to reporters outside the closed-door meeting.

He urged Iran to reconsider a decision in January 2007 to reject 38 agency inspectors.

Amano said further that Iran's selective co-operation with his inspectors means that he cannot confirm that all of Tehran's atomic activities are peaceful.

Amano's blunt comments drew a strong response from Iran, which accused him of distorting facts in his report for the gathering.

Our mission is to strengthen our unity

As we embark on the New Year, hope for peace appears tangible. While we focus on the recent summit meeting in Washington, we pray that it will lead to the signing of a historic peace treaty between Israel and the Palestinians, and bring tranquility, prosperity and security to the peoples of the region.

With a common and better future in mind, the Jewish people in the Diaspora and Israel must work together for the benefit of the generations to come and a brighter tomorrow. In this context, it is imperative that a spirit of brotherhood and a close bond with Israel continue to be a part of the Jewish and Zionist education of Jewish youth in the Diaspora. I believe the first-hand experience provided by visits to Israel plays a significant role in achieving this objective.

In a period when attempts to delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state are relentless, it is essential that we, in Israel, and the Jewish people throughout the world, jointly seek to thwart these efforts. We must mobilize our forces to expose the lies and highlight the values of the Jewish people through the ages, based on the Ten Commandments, as well as the moral and ethical values that constitute the foundations of our country and our people.

It is also vital that we stand alongside the international community in the fight against fanatic leaders, armed with nuclear weapons, and who deny the Holocaust and call for the destruction of the State of Israel.

In a world where science and technology rank high, Israel continues to stand at the forefront of advances in this domain. Indeed, we are proud of Prof. Ada Yonath of the Weizmann Institute, who received the Nobel Prize in Chemistry, and Prof. Elon Lindenstrauss of the Hebrew University, who was awarded the prestigious Fields Medal for mathematics, for their achievements and for bringing such credit to Israel and the Jewish people.

Israeli President Shimon Peres

Our mission for the coming year is to strengthen our unity in matters that affect the destinies and future of us all. We must work together in harmony and reach agreements through dialogue. Solidarity, brotherhood, tolerance and understanding are the foundations of a strong and secure family. We cannot, and must not, allow disagreements to tear us apart. We must collectively dedicate ourselves to the well-being of the Jewish people.

In this spirit, I convey my best wishes to our brethren throughout the world for a year of peace, joy, good health and prosperity.

Shanah Tovah U'metukah.

Carter urged to take up case of Gilad Schalit

Toronto lawyer makes request to former president

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jimmy Carter's reputation among supporters of Israel is, putting it charitably, less than stellar. But Toronto lawyer Bert Raphael has a suggestion that could change that.

Raphael, chair of Canadian Lawyers and Jurists for World Jewry, is suggesting the former U.S. president undertake a humanitarian mission to Gaza to secure the release of imprisoned Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit.

Where others have failed, Carter might succeed, Raphael said last week. "I think Carter has the flexibility with the Muslims to get him out. They listen to him. He's got that kind of clout. Everything else has failed."

Schalit, an Israel Defense Forces corporal, was captured by Hamas operatives in a cross-border raid from his post inside Israel. He has been held in captivity for more than four years, and Hamas has refused to allow any humanitarian organizations, including the Red Cross, to visit him or to even bring him mail.

Carter, who served as U.S. president from 1977 to 1981 and brokered the Camp David peace treaty between Israel and Egypt, recently returned from North Korea, where he secured the release of an American jailed for allegedly illegally entering from South Korea. Over the years, he has been a vocal critic of Israel, authoring a book with the provocative title Peace Not Apartheid.

Raphael believes, "Carter wants to redeem himself with the Jewish community because of the stuff he's written. Hopefully, he has the clout."

Raphael wrote to Carter, urging him to intercede.

"You have established a cordial relationship with the Palestinians, and there is no question but that they would be moved by your intervention," Raphael wrote. "There has been criticism of some of the negative comments you have made about the State of Israel. If you are successful in achieving the release of Gilad Schalit, then the respect that you earned from Jews throughout the world with your success at Camp David in achieving a peace treaty between Israel and Egypt would once again be restored."

Jimmy Carter

Raphael had not heard back from Carter as of The CJN's press time. But if he accepts, it wouldn't be the first time he has raised Schalit in talks with Hamas.

According to an item on the Carter Center's website, the former president reported in December 2008 that he travelled to Syria, where "I met with Khaled Meshal and his fellow Hamas politburo members, all of whom are scientists, medical doctors, or engineers – none trained in religion... We discussed items on my agenda that included an extension of the ceasefire in Gaza, life there under the Israeli sanctions, the Arab peace initiative, reconciliation between Hamas and Fatah, the future of Palestinian leadership and elections in the West Bank and Gaza, and formulas for prisoner exchange to obtain the release of Cpl. Schalit. Like the Syrians, they are patient, relatively satisfied with the status quo, and putting all their eggs in Obama's basket."

Focus on education

From the editor's desk...

No activity is more cherished by the millennia-old traditions of our faith and our culture than the education of our children. The obligation to teach our children is enshrined in the very watchword prayer of our faith, the Shema, whose words are taken verbatim from the Torah, that every Jew of every affiliation, fellowship and orientation learns at a young age and likely remembers for his or her entire life.

Our sages always taught that we are grossly neglectful if we do not devote "every effort to the education of our children."

Of course, they had in mind specifically Jewish education. In this day and age, however, the definition of "Jewish" education might be broadened to incorporate the wider education to enable our children to sustain themselves as family-supporting adults with dignity, reasonable prospects and confidence in the modern world. In truth, our sages also hinted at such a necessity when they obliged parents to teach their children three specific skills: the ability to study (Torah), to swim and to ply a trade.

Obviously, the rabbis of yesteryear, too, were mindful that our children needed to know how to survive as adults in an often dangerous and uncaring larger world.

As most everyone knows, however, the education of our children – whether in the public educational system or in the Jewish educational system – is an enormous undertaking. (For the purposes of this column, I restrict my observations to the Jewish educational system.)

Despite the fact that the reinforcing heart of Jewish education is, has always been and always will be the individual home and family, the macro system of delivering education to our children involves the massive mobilization of an entire community.

The Jews of Canada are regarded throughout the Jewish world as relatively literate in the traditions, customs, language, teachings, philosophy, literature and ritual of our people. A cursory search of annual Jewish community digests by demographers or sociologists will confirm this. The annual reports of the Jerusalem-based Jewish Peoples Planning Policy Institute, for example, point to the Jews of Canada this way.

This high regard is a testament to the parents going back more than a century in this country – who have clamoured for a Jewish education for their children.

It is also a testament to the visionary community leaders – lay and professional – who, also for more than a century, created those schools ex nihilo, out of nothing, except their steel-hard resolve to do what their consciences and their hearts told them needed to be done to prepare and preserve a Jewish way of life for the next generation, too: build institutions of Jewish teaching.

It is not an overstatement to write that Jewish schools are the collective, herculean synergy of a vast coming together of teachers, administrators, custodians, parents, grandparents, fundraisers, funders and, of course, children.

The president of a school, for example, volunteers her time and her energy, sometimes her emotional equilibrium, too, for the sake of the future of the school she serves. The many responsibilities of the role overlap across committees, portfolios and personalities and are never merely the domain of morning meetings, dinner discussions and gala events.

To a great degree, she is the face of the school in the community, embodying through her comportment, altruism and dedication, the finest – and it must also be said, the least fine – qualities of the school to the rest of the community. And that is only the position of the president.

Our schools are a veritable Rube Goldberg construction of innumerable moving parts of human beings and generosities.

But our Jewish schools are in jeopardy.

I might add that the Jewish schools of Ontario stand in greater jeopardy than those in other parts of Canada. For the community leaders in Ontario must try to find the funding every year without the advantage of at least some funding enjoyed by Jewish communities in other provinces. The assistance given to families by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is substantial. But, alas, it is clearly inadequate to ensure the viability of the various Jewish schools in the near future. Too many families will simply be unable to afford the costs of sending their children to a Jewish day school.

This is hardly news to anyone following the steep annual climb of tuition fees, let alone to the priority planners and decision makers in our schools and our various federations.

Strengthening Jewish identity is a high priority in every community in Canada. To be sure, it is a complex matter with myriad overarching facets, aspects, approaches and considerations.

But it is well settled by social and educational researchers and beyond doubt that the keystone to the arch of Jewish identity is Jewish education. Making Jewish education more accessible, more affordable to the families who will shy away in the future or are already bearing the suffocating financial burdens, must be the very first item on the communal agenda of strengthening Jewish identity.

With school just underway and our thoughts focused on the personal and collective meaning of the Days of Awe, it is important to acknowledge the great debt we owe to everyone involved in making Jewish education possible for our children. May they have the wisdom, resources and resolve to make it so for all generations of our children.

Ward 16 candidates focus on developmental planning

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporters

Four candidates are running for councillor in Toronto's Ward 16 (Eglinton-Lawrence).

Michael Coll, a contract firefighter, Roy Macdonald, an educator, Terry Mills, a planner and designer, all hope to unseat incumbent Karen Stintz in the Oct. 25 municipal elections.

Ward 16 is bounded by Highway 401 to the north, Yonge Street to the east, Lawrence Avenue to the south and Bathurst Street to the west.

The Jewish population makes up 10 per cent of the ward's ethnocultural demographic, and it is home to numerous community shops and stores along the Bathurst strip.

The CJN asked each candidate the following question: What are your priority issues for the ward and what would your first actions as councillor be if elected/re-elected?

Michael Coll

Michael Coll: The first [priority] is to protect small businesses.

I would work with the local Business Improvement Area (BIA) to create a parking strategy in which you can possibly provide free parking between certain hours. [Customers] go to big box malls where you can park in these vast parking lots for free and do this one-stop-shopping.

Small business makes up a large portion of Ward 16 – it's very important that we preserve that. Vacancy rates are already too high. Business property tax rates are far lower in Vaughan than in Toronto. You can't increase business property taxes in the area and expect to reduce vacancy rates. I plan to keep [the tax] the way it is or lower.

It's important that you have the right development in the right spots. In Ward 16, you have to have adequate parking provided for the use of the building[s]. You need to take a much more assertive approach with developers and indicate that the area is already burdened by parking… It's important that the developer not only realizes that, but applies it to the development.

Roy Macdonald

Roy Macdonald: One thing [Ward 16 needs] is a long-term development plan. We can't just have these massive buildings being thrown up and not thinking of a long-term sustainable plan.

[Another priority] is street safety. The amount of traffic is unacceptable and out of control. In terms of safety, there have been quite a few issues [including muggings]. We really need to see some sort of police presence in our neighbourhood. We need to see some sort of sustainable plan for safety and traffic concerns.

There's a real need for working together with the police to see what resources we can have for the neighbourhood… You don't think of Eglinton Avenue or Yonge Street and Lawrence Avenue as having huge crime levels, but there's a significant amount.

Garbage [removal] is a big issue, and snow removal is a huge concern… I'm really looking at how we deliver these services. We have to look at whether we'd contract [services] out [or]whether it'll be some combination of private and public [services].

Terry Mills

Terry Mills: Since amalgamation, we've seen that decision-making is being distanced from the community.

If elected, I would start instituting ward forums right away. Every month there would be a date when people could meet in a community hall and discuss what the community's all about.

We're a ward that is under a lot of growth pressure… [because] this is a very desirable part of Toronto for development. The one thing that concerns me is that the development thrusts that come into this ward generally just refer to the city's official plan.

That plan is only a general guide, to be implemented through local planning instruments, which have not been [created].

What you need to do is to have a community vision that can be used as a brief to guide development interests in the ward. It's what's called a development control plan, which would lay out expectations for fair standards and practices for development on a site.

Jews make up 10 per cent of ward

Karen Stintz

Karen Stintz: Maintaining our community assets such as our parks, green spaces, pools and arenas, and working to improve and enhance those assets is important.

City wide, there's an expectation that we're going to balance the books and take the necessary measures to restrain spending at city hall.

And for the community, there's been some interest in establishing some arena boards so that we can improve accessibility for the local community and make them better facilities.

There's also an interest in improving Brookdale Park and the ravine that goes through there. So I want to put together a steering committee of local residents to see if we can buy new park equipment and identify priorities to improve the local parks in the ward.

Also, we're scheduled to redo the ward's official development plan this year, and the key piece that needs to be added are density targets. Right now, we're the only centre that doesn't have density targets. We need to put these in so we can manage the development that will occur. And Bathurst [Street] also needs a secondary density plan and we'll want to put that in over the next term.

Hamas hides nothing: openly opposes peace

The head of the Shin Bet, Israel's vaunted general security services, officially reported to the Israeli cabinet on Sunday what everyone involved in the revived face to face Israeli-Palestinian peace talks already knew. Hamas has issued "an organizational directive to foil the talks." Hamas controls the Gaza Strip, evacuated by Israel five years ago. It also has terrorist cells working in the West Bank, which is controlled by the Palestinian Authority.

Yuval Diskin also warned that "threats [to Israelis] are due to increase in the near future, as diplomatic developments occur. This isn't just an estimate, but is supported by real intelligence."

On the eve of the talks that began on Sept. 2, Hamas terrorists killed four Israelis as they were driving near Hebron. Two Israelis were wounded in the area the following day. In five days from Sept. 8 to Sept. 12, Hamas launched five rockets into Israeli territory from Gaza, including a mortar shell that landed next to a daycare centre shortly before children were scheduled to arrive.

The organization does not hide its objective. Indeed, after the murder of the four Israelis, a spokesperson for Hamas boasted that some 13 militant groups had joined forces to launch "more effective attacks" against the Jewish state. Hamas and its sponsors in Tehran openly oppose the peace talks and, through their murderous ways, hope to bring them to a halt.

Thus Israeli security forces are on full alert to pre-empt further attacks and to punish the perpetrators if they occur. After the rocket landed near the daycare centre, for example, Israel's air force struck in northern and southern Gaza. On Sunday, the IDF prevented an attempted incursion by three armed Palestinian men at the security fence between Gaza and southern Israel.

But PA security forces, too, have apparently mobilized against Hamas. Last week, they arrested six Hamas-linked suspects involved in the two shooting attacks against Israelis two weeks ago.

In his report to the Israeli cabinet, Diskin confirmed that the PA's security forces had indeed arrested the perpetrators of the attacks and that they seemed intent on preventing future attacks.

This is a very welcome development, and at long last, we might add. Formerly, arrests of suspected terrorists by PA forces were more cosmetic than functional, for the sake of appearances rather than crime prevention. In truth however, the leaders of the PA have no choice but to combat Hamas.

Hamas – and their Iranian backers – are the PA's enemy as much as they are Israel's enemy. The brutal, sadistic, vicious civil war between Hamas and the PA, in which Hamas wrested control of Gaza from the PA, should put paid to any belief to the contrary. But most important of all, Hamas is the enemy of peace.

It falls, therefore, to every supporter of peace to protect the fledgling talks from Hamas' sinister schemes to bring them down.

25 years ago in The CJN

Speaking at a national Press Club luncheon in Washington, D.C., Rabbi Meir Kahane, founder of Israel's extremist Kach party, predicted he would become prime minister of Israel because its government couldn't prevent Arab terror. Kahane, who advocated expelling all Arabs from Israel and the West Bank, strongly denied he was racist and said U.S. Jewish leaders feared him becoming prime minister.

Editorial Advisory Board: Guy Aboodi, Michael Brown, Donald Carr, Rabbi Michael Dolgin, Daniel Ferman, Igor Korenzvit, Keith Landy, Hindy Najman, Lou Rosson, Alan Sandler, Rabbi Philip Scheim, Mike Shriqui, Pamela Medjuck Stein, Ehud Telem, Nelson Wiseman.

One is the loneliest number

As mitzvot go, you can't get an easier one to fulfil than hachnasat orchim – the welcoming of guests. It requires no fluency in Hebrew, no synagogue membership and no obligation to pledge $1,000 during the Kol Nidre fundraising appeal.

So why aren't more Jews heeding these words at the New Year? No doubt, there are many who extend their generosity to strangers. But there are still too many, especially singles, who leave the service as they arrived – alone.

The answer to this question is as varied as the Jewish denominations themselves. In liberal congregations, returning home for a festive meal is not a custom observed in every household. And in the observant communities, in which post-prayer meals are a tradition, invitations to family, friends and co-worshippers can sometimes mean that those without a place to eat are unintentionally overlooked.

But given how many Jews do not wish to be on their own at this time of year, synagogues must seek creative ways to bring the unaffiliated into the fold. There is nothing more embarrassing than having to raise your hand in front of an entire congregation to indicate you are wishing a home-cooked meal. The stigma of appearing alone and unattached is sufficiently humiliating to ensure that the isolated remain isolated.

That is why Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning deserves recognition for its efforts to meet the needs of those wanting home hospitality in a manner that is respectful, dignified and inclusive. Its leader, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, has developed a novel way that levels the playing field between those seeking a holiday meal and those extending it. At the conclusion of morning prayers, Rabbi Goldstein invites both would-be hosts and guests to the front of the sanctuary, where connections are made without embarrassment or shame. The success of the program should be inspiration for other congregations to follow suit.

My wish for this New Year is that no Jew walks out of synagogue lonely, and that every congregation practises, not just preaches, the mitzvah of hachnasat orchim.

Temple Beth El Jubilee Weekend

As Temple Beth El of Windsor, Ont., draws to a close a year of celebration of 50 years as a Reform congregation, we are anxious to bring our young people and others that have moved away back home. Like many communities, both large and small, most children have gone away to study and never returned, except for family visits and religious holidays.

It is important to the active, hardworking, mostly silver-haired committee of Temple Beth El that we welcome back those young people who were nurtured in their formative years by committed teachers and rabbis. We hope that you will return to Windsor for the Jubilee Weekend at the temple, Oct. 15 to 17, to reconnect to those wonderful roots of calmness and security. For more information, e-mail Congregation Beth El at bethelwindsor@cogeco.ca, or call 519-060-2422

Bialik's tuition

The recent article "Tuition fees rise across the board," regarding Jewish day school tuition fees, stated that the average fee will increase by 5.4 percent. While fee increases are a natural occurrence as a school expands, Bialik Hebrew Day School has been able to maintain some of the lowest tuition fees as compared to other day schools. Bialik has kept tuition fees manageable, with an increase of only 3.9 per cent for 2010-11, well below the day-school average. Bialik prides itself on continually providing its students with the highest standards of education in a student- and family-friendly environment. Students and teachers benefit from the most advanced educational technologies available, and we are pleased to announce that as of this year, every classroom has been outfitted with a SmartBoard. As enrolment is on the rise (up two per cent from last year), Bialik is a growing family looking forward to many new developments that will continue to provide our students with lifelong learning skills.

Misconception about UNRWA

I write this to correct a misconception many of us have about the creation of UNRWA, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency ("UNRWA perpetuates historic con game," Aug. 19). This UN refugee agency was not created for the Palestinian Arabs displaced by the 1948 war of Israel's independence. It was created for all displaced persons in Palestine, and that included Jewish refugees as well. In 1950, there were 17,000 Jewish refugees and about 28,000 Arab refugees in UNRWA camps within Israel. By June of 1952, these refugees had been rehabilitated and integrated into the country. Without any more need for UNRWA to be in Israel, it left. This should make us realize all the more the magnitude of the con game.

Peace in a year? Try getting past Sept. 26. Or is it Sept. 30? Direct talks between Palestinians and Israelis have barely begun, and already the sides are facing their first major hurdle – the end of Israel's partial moratorium on settlement building.

Several issues might beset the sides as they aim to meet the year-long deadline suggested by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and endorsed (with considerable enthusiasm) by U.S. President Barack Obama and (with less enthusiasm) by Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas.

The hard questions – the status of Palestinian refugees and the sharing of Jerusalem – promise to vex the negotiators, as they have for years. Even before that point, however, a number of issues already are creating anxiety among negotiators in Jerusalem, Ramallah and Washington.

The moratorium

Netanyahu placed a partial moratorium on settlement building to entice Abbas to the negotiating table. It lapses Sept. 26 – although not effectively until Sept. 30 because of the Sukkot holiday – and Netanyahu has said he will not renew it. Abbas says he will not be able to continue talks without it.

U.S. officials are pressing the sides to come up with a way out before the next meeting of the leaders on Sept. 14 in Egypt. Michael Oren, the Israeli ambassador to Washington, has spoken of "incentivizing" the Palestinians with other gestures.

Oren did not elaborate, but Netanyahu has made a point of talking up economic incentives for the Palestinians, including increasing commerce by reducing regulations and pulling away roadblocks.

Another way out would be for both sides to avoid questions about the deadline as it approaches and for the moratorium to continue, unofficially, without comment from either the Israelis or Palestinians. Most Israelis living within Israel's pre-1967 borders, the area known as the Green Line, wouldn't notice whether or not building was continuing in settlements, but the impact would be immediately noticeable to Palestinians.

Supporters of the settlement movement, however, say the current restrictions create burdens for the 300,000 Israeli Jews living in the West Bank. The settler community has vowed to protest unless settlement building returns to 2008 levels.

The deadline

Netanyahu wants an agreement within a year, and before that, an interim agreement outlining the parameters of a final-status deal. He has made clear, however, in private conversations with U.S. officials, that the agreement will be on paper until the Israeli leader is sure he can secure his country's borders – in other words, Israelis are saying nothing goes into effect for five, perhaps 10 years.

The Israeli expectation is that Abbas will be able to sell the Palestinian public a peace deal based on clearly detailed outlines of what they will get down the line – sort of like showing Junior the catalogue photo of the BB rifle he'll get for his 15th birthday when he's 10.

Abbas wants more tangible results, and his prime minister, Salam Fayyad, has suggested that a state could be in place by 2011. Fayyad later qualified this to say that he was referring to the infrastructure of a state, much the way the Zionist movement had the instruments of statehood ready to go for years before Israel's founding in 1948.

Abbas and the Palestinian Authority are seeking a patina of inevitability to fend off a challenge to their legitimacy by the Hamas terrorist group, which routed them from the Gaza Strip in 2007 and poses a challenge to them in the West Bank. What remains to be seen is whether state institutions – short of statehood – grants them that inevitability.

The border

Netanyahu wants a demilitarized Palestinian state, a demand the Palestinians effectively conceded in the 1990s. But like his predecessors, he also wants a long-term, if not permanent, presence in the Jordan Valley, along the border with Jordan, to contain the threat from the east that for generations has been a problem for Israelis.

The Palestinians (and the Jordanians) counter with "what threat from the east?" The prospect of having to secure Israel's longest border may have once been a concern in terms of its drain on Israel's military, but there is a peace treaty with Jordan, and the United States has neutralized Iraq. And for the Palestinians, the point of the peace is to rid themselves of any continued notion of Israeli military occupation.

Iraq may be neutralized for now, the Israelis counter, but the region is inherently unstable and Iran is staking its claim in Iraq.

The territory

So within a year, let's say there is peace with the Palestinian Authority and mutual recognition, an end to all claims.

Well, except for Gaza, which is ruled by Hamas, which does not recognize Israel or any prospects for peace – in fact, it barely recognizes Abbas.

What does peace mean without the territory Israel referred to between 1949 and 1967 as a "dagger aimed at Tel Aviv" and the acquiescence of its 1.3 million Palestinians?

Just pretend and hope, Oren says.

"We are negotiating, we, the United States and the Palestinians are all three of us negotiating – throw the Egyptians and the Jordanians in there for good measure, too – as if the West Bank and Gaza are together, when in fact we know they're not," the envoy said recently. "The assumption is, if we cut a deal with the PA and some day the people of Gaza throw off the Hamas yoke, they'll join the peace arrangement."

The word

Netanyahu has made clear that he wants the Palestinians to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, and in this, he has the Obama administration's backing. The Israeli prime minister did not invent this formulation. Tzipi Livni introduced it in 2006 when she was foreign minister.

The rationale was that the PLO's absolute recognition of Israel – extracted in excruciating negotiations by Netanyahu during his previous prime ministership in 1998 – added up to not much. In the 2000 Camp David talks, the Palestinians insisted on a Palestinian right of return, which Israel believed amounted to a peaceful plan for removing the Jewish state. The Palestinians also denied any Jewish claim to Jerusalem.

That was followed by the bloodshed of the second intifadah, and for Israelis, the failure to accept the Jews as a natural presence in the region became inextricably linked to the trauma of those years. The algebra was simple: failure to recognize the Jewish claim equals anti-Jewish incitement equals violence.

Netanyahu has said that demilitarization and recognition of the Jewish claim are the keys to reaching a true peace deal.

The PA rejects this analysis. Its reasons for avoiding the Jewish claim is the responsibility that the Palestinian leadership feels for the 20 per cent of Israelis who are Arab – it does not want to cut them out of their rights, although Netanyahu has said those rights will always be upheld.

There is also the sense among Palestinians that they have ceded enough by settling for "only" the West Bank and Gaza, 22 per cent of British Mandate Palestine.

Nonetheless, there have been signs in recent months of movement here: In a meeting with U.S. Jewish leaders in June, Abbas recognized the ancient Jewish history in the area.

When Palestinian diaspora intellectuals challenged this as capitulation last month, the PA mission in Washington pushed back not by parsing Abbas' statement, but by repeating it and saying that it did not undermine the Palestinian claim.

In related developments, senior Palestinian negotiator Nabil Shaath said at a press conference in Ramallah last Wednesday that the Palestinian Authority will not recognize Israel as a Jewish state, even though the PA acknowledges that there is a Jewish majority in Israel. Shaath said the Palestinian negotiating team turned down Netanyahu's request to discuss the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state during the upcoming round of peace talks in Sharm al Sheikh next week.

Shaath said the recognition of Israel as a Jewish state would harm Israel's Arab citizens and negate the right of return of Palestinian refugees. He added that any future peace agreement with Israel would be brought before the Palestinian people in a referendum. "If we're on the verge of a peace agreement, we will need complete unity," he said.

Meanwhile, in his Rosh Hashanah message to Diaspora Jewry, Netanyahu said making peace with the Palestinians will not be easy.

"I believe that we should make every effort to reach an historic compromise for peace over the coming year," Netanyahu said in a holiday message to Jewish communities around the world that was released last Monday. "I guarantee one thing: this will not be easy. But as Israel's prime minister, it is my responsibility to make every effort to forge a lasting peace with our neighbours.

"Lasting peace must be anchored in security, and it must be anchored in the recognition of the Jewish state's permanence in this region, not merely as a fact, but as something that our neighbours accept by right," he said.

Netanyahu pointed out that last year was the safest in Israel in two decades and reiterated that Israel has weathered the global financial crisis better than nearly any other industrial country.

"In the next year, Israel will face many challenges," the Israeli leader said. "I have no doubt that in meeting those challenges, Jewish communities around the world will stand by Israel's side – I think we've seen that every step of the way up to now. We'll see that every step of the way going forward."

In his message to the Israeli public, Netanyahu stressed that any agreement "will be based on two criteria: security and recognition of Israel as a Jewish state."

The message to the Israeli public, in Hebrew, was released on YouTube.

Defying death

Last year, I read a report about the death of a 92-year-old woman. She was a Satmar Chassid who had survived Auschwitz. We know of many who, thankfully, survived. So why was she newsworthy, and why discuss her now? Quite amazingly, by the time of her death, she had 2,000 descendants. One woman, 2,000 new lives!

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

That's something not easily subsumed under "survival." That is, in fact, death-defying.

And thought-provoking.

To state the obvious, many have tried in the past to obliterate us. Some are still trying. But this one woman powerfully responded. Her example is a quintessential Jewish rejoinder. I don't mean that we should focus on the procreational, although one can't avoid the very practical requirement and justification of that response. We do need Jews for survival.

But after so many centuries of persecution, we can be proud of our continued existence with a rich tradition and cultural heritage. Accordingly, in this season, I prefer to focus on the metaphysical aspect of her life after Auschwitz.

For some reason and in some manner, she didn't give up. Whether and in what way she despaired or was depressed, we don't know. Her survival resources are equally hidden. But we have some facts before us. She continued to live and function. She married, had children, was part of a faith community, did not detach herself, and did not leave the community or her family.

What is the model here? Because when things seem hopeless, should we give up?

Daily we hear of the failure of community, the assimilation of Jews, the impossibility of Israel's position. What are we to do? Despair? Change our ways? Join a different group?

Nonsense.

There was no more hopelessly impossible situation than Auschwitz.

Think about that when the prophets of doom surround you next. Don't give up on the next generation. Sure there's assimilation, but there are 2,000 more Jews today than the Nazis thought possible.

Intermarriage is happening, but so is return and conversion. Israel is attacked, but we can defend. Open your mouth. Stand up and act with faith.

We claim to remember to be faithful to the command of zachor. But zachor has two parts, according to Maimonides: in the heart and in the mouth. That means we must remember both by word and by deed.

So this year have a little bit of faith, remember that woman, don't despair, believe in our community and Israel, and then act upon it.

Have a great year.

Awe, repentance and our resplendent past

Every Yom Kippur, in addition to all the prayers and repetitions, petitions for forgiveness and acknowledgement of our shortcomings the previous year, our cantor chants a very strange and awesome service. This Avodah service, the mishnaic account of a priestly rite at Yom Kippur, may seem an anachronism, but it's one of the most vivid descriptions of a ritual that held immense significance for Israelites gathered in the Second Temple precincts.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Some scholars believe that secular theatre began with religious ritual enactments. Certainly the pomp associated with the Avodah ceremonies would fit this theory. The changing of the High Priest's garments, the sacramental sacrifices, the smoke from incense, the sprinkling of blood and the murmur of the priests lifted the congregation away from the ordinary. (The bleating of the animals would have added an earthy touch to what must have been moments of terror.)

In our machzor, we have both poetry and sections from Mishna Yoma that describe the service. The High Priest was charged with the most sacred duty of all: entering the Holy of Holies and pronouncing the name of God, a name that only he could pronounce and only at this point during the services.

It was a moment fraught with peril. Could he withstand the power that might emanate from the place itself, where the presence of God might overwhelm him? Would God pardon the sins of the people on whose behalf the High Priest was entreating forgiveness?

To the people, this ceremony was of cosmic importance. Everything depended on the perfect performance of the ritual: forgiveness of sins of the past year, good crops and health for the nation, and the well-being of individuals. A special prayer for the inhabitants of Bashan, where earthquakes were a constant threat, was added.

It may be true that a golden thread was attached to his leg so that, should he collapse under the strain, he could be pulled out – for no one but the High Priest was ever allowed to enter that most sanctified place. In fact, the other priests were instructed to chant while the name was pronounced so that no one (including the ordinary priests) would actually hear the name of God.

We repeat this chant – "Baruch shem kavod malkchuto l'olam va'ed" – over and over at the end of Neilah before the blowing of the shofar.

The service involved the selection of two goats, one which would be sacrificed and one that, bearing the sins of the congregation, would be driven into the wilderness southeast of Jerusalem and pushed over a cliff. To us this seems a bizarre ritual, although it did give us the English word scapegoat – a word with which Jews are all too familiar. To the watching congregation, that goat was a symbol of all sins they had committed during the past year.

Today all that is left is recitation. When the cantor chants the sections during which the congregation in the Temple fell on their faces, the rabbi and cantor actually fall to the ground.

So why recall this seemingly outmoded service?

As a Conservative Jew, I value the historical roots of our religion. The rabbis documented the Avodah service to remind us that once in Jerusalem stood a mighty Temple. During this ritual of repentance, the people of Israel reached the year's most solemn moment. Life and death hung in the balance; judgment and mercy struggled for the souls of the nation. Imagine their great relief when word came that the scapegoat had been dispatched and the High Priest had emerged unscathed from his encounter with the divine. The service links us with traditions more than 2,000 years old. Certainly Hollywood couldn't inspire us with the same awe as the memory of this past glory.

In the afternoon of Yom Kippur after the terror and the relief, it was time for matchmaking. As our mood changes from awe to rejoicing during the course of the long day, so did the mood of ancient Israel. It is another link with our resplendent past.

Religion and politics revisited

The inter-relationship between religion and politics is a reality evident throughout history and observable throughout the world today.

For example, Libya's dictatorial and tyrannical leader, Moammar Gadhafi, announced this week that he wanted Islam to become the religion of Europe. This is a frightening suggestion, given that it would have the effect of denying or even eliminating the great diversity of religion and culture there.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Conservative U.S. broadcaster and commentator Glenn Beck, at his recent Washington rally, designated "Restoring Honour," called for Americans to "turn back to God." The rally, part of the so-called Tea Party political movement, attracted national and international attention.

But one does not have to look that far away to find contemporary examples of the influence of religion on politics.

Here, in Canada, the evangelical movement has played a significant role in the make-up and policy initiatives of government. Journalist Marci McDonald documented this in her 2010 book, The Armageddon Factor: The Rise of Christian Nationalism in Canada. She argues that this influence is evident in current trends in social policies and the people in government who are wed to those policies. This is not a unique phenomenon in our country. For example, the history of Alberta politics is shaped by the Social Credit governments that were in power for decades until 1971.

The Canadian Jewish Congress has ventured into national politics on issues that relate to the well-being of all Canadians, not solely related to the interests of Canadian Jewry. However, the CJC, unlike some religiously based organizations, has never engaged in the promulgation of a Jewish agenda in respect of policy formulation.

The infusion of religion in the political process is not surprising. Throughout our lives, our values and principles inform and influence choices and actions. We are affected by our upbringing, our schools, our peers, the media and, of course, our religion. In Canada, our Constitution states, in the preamble to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, that "Canada is founded upon principles that recognize the supremacy of God." After much debate, "the supremacy of God" was included in the Constitution in 1982, although the courts have not given weight to that clause. But the preamble does officially recognize the importance of religion in our national fabric. The United States has a similar reference in its Pledge of Allegiance, which states that the United States is "one nation under God."

The religious underpinning of North American politics is, however, tempered by three factors. First, the exigencies of political reality make it imperative that politicians appeal to a wide spectrum of individuals with varying religious and social backgrounds, rather than simply embrace that portion of the electorate who are like-minded and sympathetic to their own political and religious beliefs. Moderation seems to be a key to political success and power.

Secondly, at least in Canada, our political leaders are generally open-minded and receptive to input from a diverse community when forming policies. For example, despite the deeply held beliefs of some political leaders, the federal government has not revisited the issue of abortion (although there was debate about two years ago concerning the now-abandoned private member's bill, the Unborn Victims of Crime Act).

And thirdly, in the interpretation of the Canadian Constitution, our courts have given a broad, reasonable and somewhat expansive meaning with respect to the content of our fundamental rights and freedoms, particularly in cases under the freedom of religion section of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

One sometimes reads articles, similar to the Time magazine cover story almost 45 years ago, which asked the question, "Is God dead?" Clearly, within the political realm, the opposite is true.

Politics has been described as the art of influence. The corollary is that government policy is the culmination of a process characterized by the exertion of influence. Clearly religion has and will continue to play a significant role in that process. But we should be mindful that the separation of religion and the secular state is fundamental to the preservation of Canada as a diverse, heterogeneous and multicultural society.

The Kirshner File

Israel co-opted its Arab citizens

In 1949, at the end of Israel's first war with the Arab world, 156,000 Muslim and Christian Palestinians who had not fled or been expelled found themselves in a Jewish state whose creation nearly all of them had opposed and even fought. Forming 15 percent of Israel's population, they were suddenly a marginalized minority in a land in which they had been a majority. Since the Israeli government generally viewed them as a hostile and potentially seditious fifth column, they were placed under military rule and subjected to a whole host of restrictions, including freedom of movement.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israel, in a further attempt to exert control over its Palestinian citizens, established networks of Arab informers and collaborators in Arab towns and villages.

This murky facet of Israel's history is deftly described at length by Hillel Cohen, an Israeli researcher at the Hebrew University, in a fine book, Good Arabs: The Israeli Security Agencies and the Israeli Arabs, 1948-1967 (University of California Press). Cohen's previous work, Army of Shadows, focused on the Zionist movement's system of Arab collaborators from 1917 to 1948.

In his latest book, which is based on the heretofore secret files of Israel's police and the prime minister's office, he shows how the Israeli government controlled its Arab nationals. Israel did so in part by trying to prevent Israeli Arabs from funnelling vital data to neighbouring Arab countries and joining their intelligence services.

Israel also attempted to ascertain the political leanings of prominent Israeli Arabs and to fill leadership positions with "moderates" who had not adopted nationalist positions, accepted Israel's existence and refrained from criticizing its imposition of military rule and expropriation of Arab property.

Finally, Israel worked to reshape Arab consciousness in a bid to detach Israeli Arabs from their Palestinian identity and the Arab national movement, to promote obedience to the state, to indoctrinate Arab schoolchildren with the Zionist narrative and to widen the fissures between Muslim, Christian and Druze Arabs.

In Cohen's judgment, Israel's policy was very effective. But in retrospect, he claims, Israeli Arabs "presented no real danger to Israel's security."

Despite its success in managing its growing Arab population, Israel was never really able to squelch dissent. As he puts it, "throughout the 1950s and 1960s, nationalist Arab groups and figures stood against the authorities ... as they challenged government policy."

The Communist party, known in Hebrew as Maki and later Rakah, was the principal channel through which dissension was expressed. Although the Communists were kept under surveillance and their influence was checked, they were never formally outlawed. Israel regarded the Communist party as a pressure valve through which the Arab public could let off steam. Nor did Israel wish to jeopardize its relationship, tenuous as it was, with the Soviet Union.

The question that arises is why Israeli Arabs from the Galilee to the Negev generally co-operated with the government. All but one of the Arab states that had waged war on Israel in 1948 signed armistice agreements with the Jewish state in 1949. King Abdullah of Jordan had even gone as far as handing over to Israel a large chunk of territory, the Triangle, containing many Arab villages. Due to these developments, and the fact that they were weakened by military rule, Israeli Arabs tended to focus on sheer survival.

Israeli Arabs who co-operated with the authorities were compensated, given jobs and leases to abandoned Palestinian farms, permitted to smuggle in goods, particularly meat, from bordering countries, and carry weapons.

According to Cohen, only a small minority of Israeli Arabs internalized the Zionist discourse, accepting the dogma that Israel aspired to live in peace with its Arab neighbours and intended to endow Arab citizens with full equal rights. Still other Israeli Arabs practised self-censorship, declining to get involved politically, he adds.

The government encouraged Arabs to celebrate Israel's Independence Day, but this annual event degenerated into a struggle between the state and Arab nationalists, on the one hand, and between "loyal" and "militant" forces in each village, on the other hand.

Communists, who won 20 per cent of the Arab vote in Israel's first general election, offered a nationalist alternative, conducting protests to oppose military rule and land seizures and call for equal rights and Israel's withdrawal to the 1947 United Nations partition borders.

Clashes pitting Communist activists against the police and the military government erupted routinely. Security forces made intensive use of British emergency regulations for punitive purposes. Smaller groups, such as al-Ard, which was eventually outlawed, rejected Israel's very existence. Israeli Arab informers and collaborators mounted anti-Communist crusades.

Infiltration was one of the most acute challenges faced by Israel in its early years. Gen. Moshe Dayan, the Israeli chief of staff, claimed that infiltrators were motivated by "a sea of hatred and a desire for revenge." From 1948 to 1956, Palestinian infiltrators killed more than 200 Israeli civilians and wreaked immense economic damage. In Cohen's view, the vast majority of infiltrators were refugees who simply wanted to return to their homes and reunite with their families.

Many Bedouins in Israel, such as this young man in 1950, helped the army prevent infiltration.

Some Israeli Arabs, including Druze, helped the infiltrators, some ignored them and still others took advantage of them.

Israel granted citizenship to 20,500 infiltrators who had entered the country from 1948 to 1953. An additional 3,000 Arabs were given entry permits on humanitarian grounds.

Israel thus implemented a limited "right of return" to a small proportion of the refugees who found themselves in Arab countries after the first Arab-Israeli war. Cohen says that some of the returnees rendered service to the state before 1948, while others promised to do so in the future.

The refugees did not return to formerly mixed Arab-Jewish towns such as Tiberias and Safed. Acre, once an entirely Arab town, became an Arab-Jewish municipality.

Although Israel succeeded in creating an Israeli Arab identity, it failed to convince Arab citizens to jettison their Arab and Palestinian identities completely. Cohen lists three reasons. First, Israel's ambivalent attitude toward Israeli Arabs had an effect. Second, Israeli Arabs were swept up by the fervour of Arab nationalism, as best exemplified by President Gamal Abdul Nasser of Egypt. Third, Palestinian national memory was not something that could be conveniently forgotten or cast off. Indeed, Israel's progressive decision to keep Arabic as the language of instruction in Arab schools contributed to their mental affiliation with the Arab world.

Cohen's explanation for the abolition of military rule in December 1966 is instructive. Israel, needing more Arab labourers, perceived military government as an impediment to its objective. With the collapse of the United Arab Republic – the union between Egypt and Syria that lasted from 1958 to 1961 – Israel no longer feared an Arab offensive that might be supported by its Arab citizens. Israeli opposition parties pressed for an end to military government in the Arab sector.

In conclusion, Cohen says that Israel's carrot-and-stick policy toward Israeli Arabs worked, as evidenced by the fact that they were largely loyal to the state in the run up to and during the Six Day War. And as he points out, Israel used its experiences with Israeli Arabs to build a new network of collaborators and informers in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip in the wake of the 1967 war.

Iranian exiles call for regime change in Iran

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Two Iranian exiles have called for regime change in Iran, charging that its Islamic fundamentalist government oppresses its citizens.

The exiles, Reza Kahlili, a former Iranian Revolutionary Guard member now living in California, and Marina Nemat, an ex-political prisoner who came to Canada in 1991 after spending about two years in jail, appeared at a press conference in Toronto last week at the offices of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Marina Nemat

Kahlili, wearing a baseball cap, sunglasses and surgical mask to disguise his appearance and speaking through a special device to muffle his voice, described the Iranian government as "dangerous and criminal."

Nemat, saying that the regime stifles dissent and cannot tolerate democracy, declared that Iran's government is a threat to the world and the people of Iran, and that its president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, is a "brutal man."

Kahlili, who worked undercover in Iran as a U.S. Central Intelligence Agency spy in the 1980s and 1990s, urged the West to sever diplomatic and commercial relations with Iran so as to "suffocate" the clerical establishment, the Revolutionary Guards and Ahmadinejad and thus pave the way for a new, pro-western government.

"The Iranian people want freedom and democracy."

Until now, he observed, the West has betrayed Iranians by co-operating with the Islamic regime.

Nemat, who has written two books about her imprisonment and her flight to Canada, Prisoner of Tehran and After Tehran: A Life Reclaimed, suggested that the current Islamic system of government must be "eradicated," not by foreign powers but by Iranians themselves.

Kahlili, the author of A Time to Betray: The Astonishing Double Life of a CIA Agent Inside the Revolutionary Guards of Iran, accused Iran of supporting terrorism and warned that Tehran is well on its way toward becoming a nuclear power.

Claiming that Iran has enough enriched uranium to build three atomic bombs, he said that Iran, in concert with North Korea, is currently developing inter-continental ballistic missiles capable of carrying nuclear warheads.

Kahlili, asserting that the Iranian leadership is suicidal and irrational, predicted that Iran will become emboldened and "untouchable" once it acquires a nuclear arsenal.

Forecasting that Iran will directly attack Israel one day, he said, "You can rest assured that Iran will use a nuclear bomb."

Reza Kahlili

But he cast doubt on the possibility that Israel will try to destroy Iran's nuclear infrastructure by military means.

An Israeli attack, he said, would only dent Iran's nuclear sites and prompt Iran and its allies, Hezbollah and Hamas, to retaliate fiercely, causing many casualties.

In his view, the overthrow of the current regime is the best solution for ending Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons.

But in an interview, he said it is already too late to stop Iran from going nuclear.

A new, democratic Iran, he noted in a brief interview following the press conference, would restore diplomatic ties with the United States and Israel.

Taking issue with Kahlili, Nemat said that Iran has no intention of "nuking" anyone, fearing it will be "nuked back."

She said that economic sanctions against Iran will not really accomplish much unless Russia and China agree to impose much tougher measures in the future.

Kahlili said that observers should differentiate between the theocratic Iranian regime and the Iranian people, claiming that the latter are generally pro-western.

He claimed that Iran has sent intelligence agents to Canada and uses mosques in Europe for operational purposes.

Kahlili and Nemat were introduced by Avi Benlolo, the president and chief executive officer of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

Benlolo called on Canada and other western nations to press the International Criminal Court to indict Ahmadinejad – a vocal and persistent advocate of Israel's destruction – on charges of incitement to commit genocide.

He also said that international sanctions against Iran will not work.

Jewish Life

Yom Kippur and spiritual readiness

By RABBI MEIR ROSENBERG

Upon reflection, it seems almost unreal that another year has gone by so quickly.

Our goal as individuals, families and as a Jewish community, though, should remain somewhat the same this year, much as they did at the beginning of last year – living our lives in a purposeful and Jewish manner. In order to succeed, we must return for a moment to a time when we received our first mandate as a Jewish nation.

When God gave us the Torah at Mount Sinai, he succeeded in fulfilling the destiny of the Jewish nation by giving us purpose. Consequently, in great measure, the creation of this world was based on our acceptance and subsequent observance of Torah.

The midrash tells us that when God descended upon Mount Sinai, the world stood still, because the purpose of creation was about to be revealed. Yet despite this great revelation, it's most disturbing that it failed to have a lasting impact upon us, for soon afterward, we created a golden calf. Moses, upon learning of this from atop the mountain, shatters the luchot containing the Ten Commandments. How could such a great beginning have such an abysmal end?

All was not lost, since Moses is commanded to write a second set of tablets, which are received on the 10th of Tishrei, Yom Kippur, by the Jewish nation. These are enduring and are received in sincerity by the Jewish nation.

The great commentator Rashi explains that the first tablets that were given amid tumult, thundering and a great assembly were affected by the evil eye, whereas the second tablets, which were given under more modest circumstances, were able to endure.

While Rashi teaches us a very important moral lesson, it doesn't fully explain the circumstances surrounding the second tablets. Why did God command Moses to write the second set of tablets instead of giving them to him ready-made from Heaven, as was the first set? Additionally, God instructs Moses to write the new tablets at the foot of the mountain and then carry them to the top. Was all this really necessary? Yes! It was precisely these instructions that explain the durability of the second set of luchot.

Rabbinic Reflections

God initially made a revelation that we were not spiritually prepared to appreciate. In a moment of great inspiration, we exclaimed: "We will do and we will listen." This desire quickly passed, and a great sin ensued.

The second tablets, though, were brought up from below. They were written by Moses and sanctified by God and were the result of a nation that was now spiritually ready to connect with the word of God.

Inanimate objects have the potential to destroy or create. Their destiny is determined by the level of education and preparedness of their wielder. The same is true of religious philosophy. As Jews, our greatest tool for living a purposeful life is in the preparation at the beginning of the New Year. We should allow ourselves to be inspired by the Yom Tov tfillot, as well as the cantor and rabbinic sermons. Without this personal initiative, we risk feeling empty and unmoved by our Judaism and its atmosphere, which could possibly lead to some most self-destructive behaviour.

Moses was told to "inscribe for yourself" – make yourself a proper vehicle to receive God's word.

Only our Almighty Father in Heaven knows our ultimate destiny. But through our active participation in religious life – at home, in our synagogues and in the Jewish community – we ensure that we play a major role in determining our blessings for the coming year.

I would like to take this opportunity to wish each of you and your families a most enjoyable and uplifting Yom Tov. May each of us look forward to a year filled with joy and success, health and happiness and the fulfilment of the hopes and desires of our Jewish nation.

Rabbi Meir Rosenberg is spiritual leader of Congregation Ayin L'Tzion in Thornhill, Ont., and national executive director of Mizrachi Canada.

The morning after

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The High Holiday period is one – we hope – filled with introspection, reflection and a commitment to try to become a better person. Our religious antennae are at their highest point as we spend the day in prayer and fasting. For many, it's the only time of the year that any significant amount of time is spent in communal prayer. It's a day when we focus on the fragility of life, remembering those who are no longer with us and pleading that we be spared from that fate.

It's a time that makes many a rabbi nervous as they work to deliver a sermon that will be thoughtful and inspirational – not an easy task when dealing with a very demanding "clientele." Topics such as Israel, family, assimilation, Shabbat, tzedakah, social activism and community involvement are the order of the day. Our Yom Kippur experience is meant to inspire us even – or, shall we say, especially – when the day is long gone.

As important and central as Yom Kippur is, it's the day after that's much more crucial. Fasting and prayer in of themselves are of little value. However, if our hunger motivates us to help alleviate the misfortune of others, then one has had a meaningful fast – a fulfilment of the Talmudic dictum that the "reward for a fast is charity."

A little biblical history may shed some light on what should be an additional area on which to focus in the aftermath of Yom Kippur.

"It was on the next day that Moses sat to judge the people and the people stood by Moses from the morning until the evening" (Exodus 18:13). Moshe Rabbeinu, as many great leaders are wont to dao, tried to do everything himself, without delegating tasks to others. He was the sole judge adjudicating all financial disputes – a task that literally took up his entire day. His father-in-law, Yitro, warned him that he was bound to fail if he continued in his ways.

The Torah goes out of its way to note that this happened on the "next day," a strange expression, especially considering the Torah makes no mention of the previous day. Our sages note that the previous day was none other than the very first Yom Kippur. Yom Kippur must inspire us to resolve our outstanding monetary disputes with others.

Yet this wasn't the only thing that was happening on the day after Yom Kippur. According to our sages, the command to build a tabernacle took place on the day after Yom Kippur.

The Torah links these two seemingly unrelated events, placing them both on the day after Yom Kippur.

A tabernacle can only be built if our monetary disputes are settled. One can pray, fast and repent all day and night, but unless one reconciles with one's fellow man, Yom Kippur cannot atone for our sins. God will not, and actually cannot, forgive sins committed against another human being. While it's perhaps unfortunate that people must be involved in monetary disputes to begin with, it's the way of the world. What's crucial is that a mechanism exist – and is taken advantage of – to resolve these inevitable disputes.

Yitro advised Moshe to select judges who, among other qualities, would "hate money." Money can be a wonderful tool in life, and it's natural and appropriate to love some of what money can buy. However, if we're in love with money itself, we're bound to love other, more important aspects of life less.

It's not by chance that Jewish law prohibits the handling, and even talking about, money on Shabbat and holidays, days devoted to increasing our love of God and our fellow man.

Jewish Life

The Artscroll revolution

In our age of the Internet, many people worry about the future of the printed book. But at least one publisher is doing surprisingly well: the haredi publishing house, Artscroll. Jeremy Stolow's new book, Orthodox By Design: Judaism, Print Politics and the Artscroll Revolution (University of California Press, 2010) is an avant-garde analysis of the Artscroll phenomenon.

Stolow, an assistant professor of communication studies at Concordia University, studied for his PhD in the cutting-edge social and political thought program at York University. Stolow does not analyze Artscroll books from a perspective of classical Jewish studies (a field in which he did not train) but explains how Artscroll manages to be a "purveyor of handsomely designed, accessible, and uncompromisingly Orthodox" books.

Martin Lockshin

Much of Stolow's book centres on the ironic disconnect between Artscroll's use of every innovative way to package Jewish texts, while doing so to promote a haredi approach that allegedly rejects all "of modernity. To defend their anti-modern worldview, haredi publishers like Artscroll have to "master the use of speech genres, managerial techniques, and modes of cultural activity found in the 'outer-world' domains of advertising, fundraising, political lobbying, secular scholarship, popular music and fashion." (Readers unacquainted with current academic jargon will find parts of this book slow going.)

Artscroll might be best known for its prayer books and its monumental project, the Shottenstein Talmud, a 73-volume English-language version of the Babylonian Talmud. But Stolow also lists and analyzes other surprising genres that have been made "kosher" by Artscroll – including 50 titles of haredi adventure and fiction. Concerning those works, Stolow quotes the discerning words of Rabbi Yoel Finkelman, a popular teacher in Jerusalem, who argues that every appropriation of a new cultural form "runs the risk of profaning the sacred rather than sanctifying the profane."

Artscroll claims that they promote "maximum comprehension with minimum effort." A number of their customers whom Stolow interviewed agree. One 20-something informant said: "I still really like the way, like, how it basically assumes that you're an idiot without treating you that way." Without doubt, the Artscroll product has found a niche. But the question remains: what actually is communicated through Artscroll books?

Stolow mentions the sharp criticisms of Artscroll by scholars, such as Prof. Barry Levy of McGill University, who have noted the inaccuracies and awkwardness of the translations, and the tendentiousness of the material chosen.

Stolow devotes more attention to discussing the significance of the fact that Jewish classics and manuals of Halachah are, because of Artscroll, now achieving much wider dissemination in America (and beyond) than ever before. Stolow frequently argues that this is a method of spreading haredi control. But at least once in the book he offers the possibly inconsistent claim that the wide dissemination of book knowledge to the kinds of readers who never had such knowledge in the past is a form of empowerment that lessens the readers' reliance on their rabbis, a reliance that has always been a crucial element for religious control.

As he writes, "Artscroll marks the point of a shift in the balance of power between, on the one hand, locally situated teachers, legal interpreters, and ritual leaders and, on the other hand, the commanding voice of the text. Now it is the text alone that commands."

Knowledge has always represented power in traditional Judaism. Changing the modes of access to knowledge has always had repercussions. Stolow's analysis could have benefited from considering previous Jewish "revolutions" of access to written legal materials.

In the 12th century, for instance, Moses Maimonides revolutionized and partially democratized access to knowledge of Halachah. Until then, in order to figure out the law on any issue, a Jew had to master the entire Talmud, an enormous free-flowing corpus written in a unique combination of Aramaic and Hebrew, with little discernable structure and no index. The Talmud presents multiple opinions and it is not always clear which one is "authoritative" in the Jewish tradition.

Maimonides gathered all the authoritative talmudic statements into one well-organized law code, the Mishneh Torah, which he wrote, as he himself boasts, in easy Hebrew. The result was that new classes of Jews now had access to halachic rulings and, as a result, the traditional centralized authority of the rabbis in Iraq (Babylonia), who called themselves rashei ha-golah (the leaders of all diaspora Jewry), was reduced and ultimately eliminated, shifting authority to local community rabbis and, potentially, to educated laymen.

In the 16th century, with the invention of the printing press, another sea change occurred in the spread of Jewish learning, leading to more changes in the status of rabbis. Two great rabbis of that century, Shemuel di Medina (Responsa Maharshdam, Hoshen Mishpat 1) and his student, Avraham di Boton (Lehem Mishneh, Talmud Torah 5:4) wrote that some of the traditional Jewish rules about honour due to rabbis no longer applied, since now "ha-sefarim hem ha-melammedim," i.e. books are our teachers, not human beings.

Of course it is hard to imagine that Artscroll writers and publishers actually want to see rabbinic authority diminished further. But the results of any project are not always identical to its goals. While Artscroll claims to be a bulwark against change, could their project possibly lead to a (partial) breakdown of the authoritarian hierarchical structure of haredi society?

To me the most significant part of "the Artscroll revolution" is its promotion of the study of Jewish classics in English translations, a point that Stolow only touches upon.

In traditional Judaism, there is a long history of opposition to the translation of works of Halachah into other languages. When Moses Maimonides wrote his Mishneh Torah, he was asked to authorize a translation of that work into Judeo-Arabic. He refused. He was happy to democratize Jewish law partially, by making it accessible to all Hebrew readers, but not to readers of the vernacular. And in the 19th century, the translation of Rabbi Shelomo Ganzfried's Kitstsur Shulhan Arukh into Yiddish was considered a controversial step, evoking much opposition, even from the author himself.

Hebrew reading comprehension has always been a crucial Jewish value. The opposition to translations of works of Halachah was not arbitrary elitism; it encouraged Jews to learn the national Jewish language.

One of the greatest blessings of the modern Jewish world is the creation of the State of Israel. And one of the greatest accomplishments of the Zionist movement was the revitalization of Hebrew as a spoken and written language.

Hebrew, as the national language of the Jewish people, is one of the few Jewish values that unite secular and religious Jews. Any Jew living in Israel, and many diaspora Jews today, are able to read classics of Halachah, like Maimonides' Mishneh Torah and Ganzfried's Kittsur Shulchan Aruch, in the original Hebrew. I would estimate that over half of the world's Jews – a higher percentage than at any time in the last 2,000 years – now have that level of Hebrew reading comprehension skills.

The Artscroll revolution almost totally ignores the State of Israel, and harms efforts to convince American Jews that they should get with the program and learn Hebrew, too. Is this the right time for the biggest translation project in the history of the Jewish people to undermine the crucial Jewish value of Hebrew?

RHA finance director honoured on retirement

Famous ancestor inspires arts-related gift

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Sue Walsh was director of finance at Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) for 15 years until her retirement at the end of August, but it's the school's arts program that will benefit from a generous gift in her honour.

Although Walsh claims no artistic talent herself, her great-grandfather was renowned Jewish painter Isidor Kaufmann, whose work can be found in museums, private collections and among Sotheby's Judaica offerings.

Kaufmann – who was born in 1853 in Arad, Romania, part of what was then the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and died in 1921 – was a landscape and portrait artist known for his depictions of Jews in eastern European shtetls.

The art room at RHA's Beth Tzedec campus will be named in his honour. As well, four monetary awards (two at each of the school's two campuses) will be presented annually at RHA's graduation ceremony. One will honour a student's outstanding achievement in visual arts, and the other will recognize menschlichkeit, tikkun olam and empathy.

Sue Walsh

The gift is being made available through the school's Hans and Kitty Schafer fund, established 15 years ago to honour Walsh's parents.

Walsh, 61, will be honoured by the school at a l'chaim on Sept. 20 at the Elevator Gallery.

Before she joined the staff of United Synagogue Day School, as RHA was known until earlier this year, Walsh was a school parent and board member.

She had been director of finance at B'nai Brith Canada for more than six years when she joined the school as its comptroller (the position was later renamed). Prior to that, she worked in the private sector.

The mother of two grown children and new grandmother of a three-month-old grandson in Israel decided to retire after being diagnosed with lymphoma in January.

Having recently finished treatment, Walsh said in an interview at the school's Beth Tikvah campus that now is "the right moment to go a different route and be grateful."

She's thankful that she was diagnosed early, and credits the school for allowing her to work part-time when her stamina was low.

Walsh said that Jewish education has always been important to her and that it's been meaningful to work at a Jewish school. "You always feel like the work is worthwhile."

Over the years, with rising day school fees, she said she has seen more parents not choosing Jewish education because of the cost. "The costs act as a barrier to them starting, and that's heart-breaking for me."

A native of London, England, Walsh is a certified general accountant and has a bachelor of commerce degree from the University of Leeds.

Her family was close with Walsh's great-uncle, Philip – Isidor's son – who was also an artist. As a teen, Walsh used to visit him at his studio around the corner from the famed Abbey Road Studios.

"I used to love to visit him – primarily because I thought I'd get a glimpse of the Beatles," she said, laughing. "I think I did, once."

Walsh and her husband, Mark, have been in Canada for more than 30 years, including a three-year stint in Calgary. Her parents, both originally from Vienna, followed them to Toronto 20 years ago.

The arts aspect of the recent gift reflects her family's belief that "it's important for kids to have a more rounded education," Walsh said. "We have a passion for the arts… This seemed like a neat fit."

As well, she noted, her father, a retired businessman, is a Rotarian and used to volunteer at B'nai Brith. Until last year, he was on the board of George Brown College Seniors' Association, she added.

Walsh's mother, Kitty Schafer, told The CJN in a phone interview that her grandfather travelled to eastern European shtetls for several consecutive summers to paint in the late 1800s, at the suggestion of a patron.

"It was very difficult," she said, explaining that the journey itself seemed like going to the moon would today, and that religious people in the shtetls didn't necessarily want their portraits painted.

Kaufmann himself was "not really religious," she said.

Schafer – who was born three months after her grandfather's death and left Vienna in 1939 for London, England – said that, sadly, she has no originals of Kaufmann's works.

She thinks the fund is "a wonderful idea" and is pleased that it will preserve the name of her grandfather, who is less well-known here than in Europe.

Obstacles to peace, real and imagined

Settlement issue resurfaces following talks

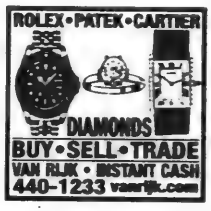
Last week's column described the widespread skepticism that characterized media reports leading up to the Sept. 1-2 Washington summit between Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

It was all the more interesting, then, to see that in the immediate aftermath of the meeting, most news reports conveyed a very different attitude – one reflective of the serious, cooperative approach to work to resolve the Palestinian-Israeli conflict adopted by both leaders.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In so doing, the media "played it straight." That is to say, even if many journalists covering the summit personally retained a prior skepticism that anything meaningful might result from these talks (given the failures of past meetings and the formidable obstacles lying ahead), they didn't allow it to colour their stories. This was a gain for impartial reporting which, as many media analysts have recently noted, is increasingly succumbing to the intrusion of opinion. But in this case it also, ironically, brought news reports on what occurred in Washington more in line with the optimism expressed just prior to the summit by numerous commentators on the op-ed pages who predicted that something substantial would develop this time.



Paul Koring's front-page report for the Sept. 3 Globe and Mail was indicative of this perspective. He began: "Glimmers of hope that Palestinian-Israeli talks will finally herald peace after decades of failure, recrimination, bloodshed and despair emerged Thursday from a meeting brokered by U.S. President Barack Obama."

Koring immediately supported this lead, quoting from Netanyahu's remarks the previous night in the White House:

"'The people of Israel and I, as their prime minister, are prepared to walk this road and to go a long way in a short time to achieve a genuine peace,' said Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, whose embracing of the process and willingness to accept an independent Palestine has made the prospect of a deal within a year a viable possibility.

"'I see in you a partner for peace,' said Mr. Netanyahu, the usually hawkish leader whose apparently heartfelt overture to Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas set the tone over the past two days and defied many naysayers."

Quoting from Abbas, Koring also wrote that he "sounded equally sincere."

While Koring noted that Netanyahu's and Abbas' rhetoric and their commitment to meet every two weeks were reasons for "cautious optimism," he noted that serious challenges lie ahead. Foremost is the need to reach an agreement on the the critical final status issues. Unlike some other reporters who tend to fixate solely on the issue of settlements, Koring mentioned other key issues in addition to settlements, namely Jerusalem and refugees.

As this column has pointed out previously, settlements, though undeniably a complicated issue, is resolvable. In fact, the broad outline of a deal was reportedly accepted by the Israel and the Palestinians at the Camp David summit in 2000. A final status agreement broke down not on that subject but rather over these other two issues – especially Jerusalem (to be more precise, over then-PA president Yasser Arafat's refusal to recognize Jewish claims to the holy sites). A similar situation occurred when, in September 2008, Abbas walked away from then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert's offer of Palestinian statehood.

However, according to other more recent media reports, and just days after the Washington talks, we're apparently back to the standard refrain that settlements are the obstacle to peace. Only now the charge is that if Netanyahu fails on the Sept. 26 deadline to extend the moratorium on housing construction in the West Bank, the Palestinians will be forced to give up on the talks. The consequence will likely be to blame Israel for (so the unfounded charge goes) scuttling talks that it wasn't really serious about holding in the first place, a reinforcement of the pre-Washington summit skepticism – even cynicism – about Netanyahu.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu meet face to face.

Should this scenario unfold, what are the chances of the media being just as skeptical of a politically weak Abbas looking for a convenient excuse to avoid having to make concessions on the issue that are truly obstacles to a deal? That is, what are the odds of the media holding Abbas accountable when it comes to a compromise on Jerusalem and having to give up the "right of return" of Palestinians to Israel in order to achieve a two-state solution?

Mercy killing prohibited in Judaism, symposium told

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Judaism regards hastening the death of a terminally ill person as murder, participants in a day-long symposium on Jewish medical ethics were told.

The educational program intended for health-care professionals was organized by the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) department of pastoral services, in conjunction with the Jewish Community Council of Montreal.

It coincides with Quebec's province-wide consultation on the issue of dying with dignity. A national assembly committee is studying the possible decriminalization of euthanasia and assisted suicide.

Pastoral services director Rabbi Raphael Afilalo, and Dr. Michael Bouhadana, a supportive-care consultant to the JGH, made it clear that traditional Judaism forbids any act that leads to the end of a life, regardless of the person's health, age, state of cognition, family wishes, or any other factor.

This includes stopping treatment, as well as sustaining care such as nutrition, fluids or oxygen, even when artificially administered. "Once these are in place they cannot be withdrawn, even if the family asks for it," Bouhadana said.

Nor can one life be valued over another, according to Halachah. This means, for example, that if there is only one respirator available, an elderly, near-death patient cannot be removed from it to save the life of a young person with a chance of survival, Bouhadana said in response to an audience question.

According to Jewish belief, saving one person does not justify killing another.

On the other hand, Judaism prohibits impeding the dying of a goses, a person who is not expected to live more than three days, Bouhadana said.

"It is clear that we cannot take a life before its time; but once the dying process has started, neither can we slow it down," he said. But those near death can be palliated through pain medication, for example.

Rabbi Raphael Afilalo, left, and Dr. Hananel Holzer were among the speakers

Judaism, Bouhadana and Rabbi Afilalo suggested, stresses the sanctity of the individual's life over its subjectively determined "quality." No one should be allowed to decide a life is not worth continuing, and in exceptional cases when therapies are withheld, it should not solely be the doctor's choice.

Both stressed that they were presenting the position of traditional Judaism, which is not necessarily the policy of the JGH. As a public institution, JGH abides by the law.

Bouhadana and Rabbi Afilalo said their role is to advise Jewish patients or their relatives who want to know what Judaism says.

"Withholding [care] may be permitted because it is passive," Bouhadana added. Some examples are not initiating CPR with a dying person after the heart has stopped, or continuing chemotherapy to someone who has been unresponsive to it.

A competent person can refuse treatment if they are terminal and not expected to live beyond one year, according to Jewish law. But declining food, water or oxygen is "tantamount to suicide," unless a person, for instance, believes force-feeding will harm him.

"Every case is separate; in general, if we know we are creating more suffering, it may be permissible to stop," Bouhadana said.

Living wills are permitted, he said, and halachic versions are available, which provide for interventions the person wants to be undertaken in a certain situation, as well as those they don't want.

Similarly, "do not resuscitate" orders can be abided by when the chance of success is low and the risk of pain or disability is high, which must be assessed at the time.

"The DNR or living will must never mean the same as 'do not treat,'" he said.

Bouhadana, a family practitioner, said he sees a lot of elderly patients, regardless of their religion, who are fearful of not getting treated. "They are reticent to agree to a DNR, fearing they will not get proper treatment. They'd rather keep the default position: assess me at the time."

Bouhadana noted that in Jewish law, a terminal illness is specifically defined as one that is expected to claim the person's life within a year. It does not mean a progressively debilitating condition such as Alzheimer's or ALS, or a persistent vegetative state, and therefore those with these kinds of conditions "should get the full range of treatment."

Rabbi Afilalo cited a recent case at the JGH where a family consulted him on whether they should continue medical intervention.

The case was that of a man, 85, with congestive heart failure and dementia, who fractured his spine in a fall at his nursing home.

He was comatose and was put on a respirator when he arrived at emergency. Doctors then determined that he was "brain dead" and wanted to remove the respirator.

His observant son, however, wanted to know what Jewish law had to say.

Rabbi Afilalo had to tell him there is a controversy among rabbis over whether the cessation of brain stem activity alone is enough to determine death, or if the heart must have stopped as well.

The preponderance of opinion, endorsed by the Supreme Rabbinical Council of Israel last year and most of the Rabbinical Council of America, is that brain stem death is death, and therefore life support can be stopped – which is Canadian law. After Rabbi Afilalo explained the two positions, the son decided his father would be kept on the respirator but that no new treatment would be started. The man died a day and a half later.

Calgary man convicted of hate crime, mischief

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A young man has pleaded guilty to multiple charges – including promoting hatred – arising out of anti-Semitic vandalism in Calgary last November.

The man, who was 17 at the time and cannot be identified, admitted spray-painting swastikas and anti-Semitic slogans on two synagogues, a Holocaust memorial, mailboxes and a fence, said Judy Shapiro, interim executive director of the Calgary Jewish Community Council.

He pleaded guilty to the hate promotion charge as well as mischief to property and mischief to a place of religious worship. He will be sentenced on Oct. 15.

"I think people are incredibly grateful to the police and the attorney general for taking it very seriously and pursuing it as a hate crime," Shapiro said.

The suspect was identified through video surveillance cameras and arrested in Winnipeg last March.

At the time, the graffiti surprised the Jewish community. "This is unheard of," Shapiro said.

The individual daubed a swastika on the House of Jacob Mikveh Israel Synagogue and a Holocaust memorial at the nearby Jewish Community Centre, as well as the epithets, "kill Jews," "F--- Jews" and "six million more."

News of the crime sparked "a huge outpouring of support for the Jewish community," Shapiro said. A rally attracting some 500 people was organized in short order, attended by political figures, ethnic and religious communities and organizations promoting diversity.

"That was the most amazing thing," she said. "The entire community rallied around us."

In Toronto, Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, applauded Calgary police for laying hate crime charges.

"It was absolutely the right thing to do," he said. "I think it does send a strong message that society won't put up with this garbage."

Cotler readies for anti-Semitism meet

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — An international anti-Semitism conference Nov. 7 to 9 in Ottawa will likely adopt a "protocol" to add to the declaration that emerged at a similar meeting in London last year, Liberal MP Irwin Cotler said.

"That's what we're expecting," Cotler, the Liberals' special counsel on human rights and international justice, said at a Sept. 2 press conference at his Mount Royal riding office.

At the inaugural Conference and Summit of the Inter-parliamentary Coalition for Combating Antisemitism established in February 2009, signatories to the London Declaration called on their respective governments and the United Nations "never to allow" international institutions to be used to give anti-Semitism legitimacy.

About 120 parliamentarians from 40 countries are expected in Ottawa, as was the case at the inaugural conference, Cotler said.

The former justice minister said Bloc Québécois representatives are also expected to participate. Last year, the Bloc pulled out of a Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism (CPCCA) inquiry on anti-Semitism because the CPCCA declined to accept submissions from the Canadian Arab Federation and Canadians for Justice and Peace in the Middle East.

"I work closely with the Bloc on many issues regarding civil liberties," Cotler said. "I believe they will be present [at the Ottawa conference]."

Cotler used his meeting with reporters to lambaste Prime Minister Stephen Harper's government on a number of issues, including "mismanaging" taxpayers' money, "silencing dissidents," planning abolition of the gun registry and of the mandatory long form of the census, and to outline his own agenda for the coming parliamentary session.

Winnipeg ballet company heading to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Missions have been bringing Winnipeg Jewish community leaders to Israel for more than 20 years, but in mid-October a who's who of high-profile Manitobans will touch down in the Holy Land.

Joining the usual contingent of community leaders and major donors will be Premier Greg Selinger, Minister of Water Stewardship Christine Melnick, Minister of Innovation, Energy and Mines Dave Chomiak, as well as the acclaimed Royal Winnipeg Ballet (RWB).

For the ballet, which is celebrating its 70th anniversary this year, the trip will mark its first visit to Israel since 1975. At the time, it was the first Canadian ballet company to perform in the Jewish state.

The upcoming mission, sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, will see the premier make his first visit to Israel, while this will be Melnick's fourth trip.

Over the years, Manitobans have developed "a special relationship with Israel," Melnick said in a telephone interview from Winnipeg.

As minister in charge of water stewardship, she has been instrumental in bringing together Manitoba's and Israel's top experts for symposiums on water-related issues, the first in August 2008, the second in January 2010. Melnick hinted there may be announcements in Israel of further joint projects, but she would not elaborate.

Melnick has been a voice for co-operation between the two jurisdictions and has had a special affinity for Israel since her first visit there in 1997 as a backpacker.

"It was great," she recalled. "I think it's a fantastic country and the Jewish people are a fantastic people. I went to Israel and had no idea what to expect and found this incredible country and incredible people – the energy, the vibrancy, the intellectual stimulation was like no place I'd ever been before. I've been to many countries, but Israel is the only one I've been back to."

In addition to touring, Manitoba legislators will meet Israeli dignitaries to discuss politics and trade, and Selinger will no doubt meet with "top Israeli politicians," said Amir Gissin, Israeli consul general for Toronto and Western Canada.

The mission "reflects the levels of relationships between Israel and Canada that go beyond the federal level." It also illustrates that there is more to Israel than merely the political aspect. "We welcome visits that have a cultural flavour," Gissin said.

The ballet is scheduled to perform seven times in Israel and once in Amman, Jordan. It will also hold a workshop for young dancers in Jaffa as part of the official opening of the Playground for Peace.

The playground is sponsored by the Manitoba-Israel Shared Values Roundtable, which is Melnick's brainchild, along with the Jewish National Fund of Israel, the Tel Aviv Foundation and the Jewish National Fund of Manitoba. The Roundtable, which Melnick established prior to entering politics, celebrates fundamental values that link the province and Israel, including "democracy, free speech, public health care and public education, all the values that make for a healthy and civil society," she said.

The province's links to Israel go even farther, Melnick continued. The province celebrated Israel's 60th anniversary with a number of performances at the Pantages Playhouse that attracted 900 people, only about 30 of whom were Jewish, and "we celebrated Tel Aviv's 100th last year with a visit from the mayor of Tel Aviv," she said.

Mel Lazareck, president of the Jewish National Fund's Prairie region, said the mission should leave a positive impression among participants about "the real Israel.

"Invariably, first-time travellers to Israel are simply amazed at this sophisticated First World environment – from the basic accommodations as tourists, to Israel's accomplishments in just over 60 years, to the high-tech being applied in such fields as medicine, engineering, agriculture, recycling and water technology to name a few.

"I have yet to talk with any Israeli visitor whose views and impressions have not dramatically changed after their visit," he said.

Kate Hodgert, publicity manager for the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, said the company is eager to recapture some of the atmosphere of the 1975 trip to Israel. That visit came in the midst of the RWB's international touring heyday. "Our company has been defined as a touring company; however, we hadn't been overseas in several years… We wanted to go overseas and make it with a splash."

The ballet approached the the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg to include the company in the mission, but the ballet credits former Israeli ambassador Alan Baker for getting the ball rolling two years ago. Baker had been moved by a performance of the ballet and suggested it visit Israel again, Hodgert said.

The company will spend three weeks in Israel and Jordan performing, holding workshops and touring.

"It's a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," Hodgert said. "All the dancers are thrilled and are counting down the days."

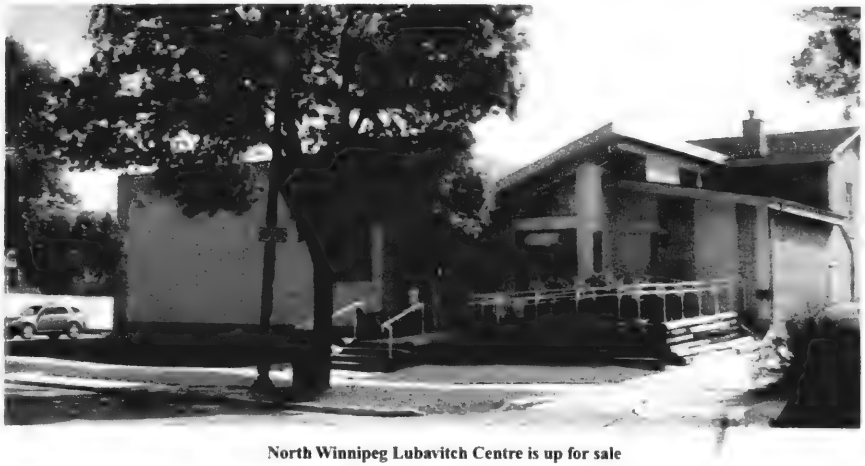
For sale: Winnipeg Lubavitch Centre

New building in city's south end to serve community

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent



North Winnipeg Lubavitch Centre is up for sale

WINNIPEG — You could say it's a sign of the times.

As construction of the new south Winnipeg Lubavitch centre is racing toward a mid-October completion date, a "for sale" sign has gone up in front of the North Winnipeg Lubavitch Centre.

The building of a new Lubavitch centre in south Winnipeg and the decision to sell the north end building are further reflections of the continuing demographic shift in this city's Jewish community from the north to the south end.

When Rabbi Avraham Altein came to Winnipeg in 1972 to bring the teachings of Chabad to Winnipeg, the majority of the Jewish population was still living "north" (although even then there was a steady movement "south"). Rabbi Altein established the original Lubavitch centre in a north Winnipeg suburb in 1980.

Although the north end Lubavitch centre has regular Erev Shabbat and Shabbat minyanim, as well as yom tov services, Rabbi Altein said the the building was never intended to be used primarily as a shul.

"We built an education centre from which to run our various community programs," he said. "The minyan was just one aspect of that. We don't have any memberships, and we don't have a Chabad community here. We have a few shlichim here to serve the entire community."

Lubavitch programs in Winnipeg include summer and winter children's camps, summer yeshiva programs, yom tov activities, speakers and much more.

The new building in south Winnipeg is much larger than the north end location. It will house a multi-purpose social hall/lecture hall/synagogue along with classrooms, a library, a small gym for Chabad's preschool program and camps, and separate mikvahs for men and women.The new building will be able to accommodate 350 to 400 people

"The best way to put it is that we are restructuring," Rabbi Altein said.

As to the daveners in the north end who currently attend Shabbat services at the current North End Lubavitch Centre, some arrangements will be made, Rabbi Altein says.

"Maybe we can work out something with the new owners – or find an alternative location – or arrange a merger with another shul in the area."

Aboriginal student group reps join CFJS retreat

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Eric Chapman had his first camp experience this summer. He swam, canoed and learned about effective leadership and Israel advocacy.

Chapman, a third-year biology student and co-president of Queen's University Hillel, was one of around 50 to 60 campus leaders who took part in the Canadian Federation of Jewish Student's (CFJS) annual retreat at Camp Gesher, near Cloyne, Ont.

The retreat, which ran from Aug. 26 to 29, helped students develop leadership skills and included lectures from organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress.

"This was my first CFJS conference. I wanted to make sure I was ready to be co-president of Queen's Hillel," said Chapman, 20. "I gained a lot of experience hearing other leaders that have been in high positions for a long time. It really inspired me."

Chapman, who had never been to Camp Gesher before, learned about Israel advocacy and dealing with the media.

The third-year biology major also did some bonding.

"I had never been to camp growing up. It was a big deal for me. You really get to feel how people come together. You really become a family," he said.

Chapman also enjoyed hearing from the Assembly of First Nations, which had representatives come to the retreat for the first time this year.

"It was quite interesting… to see how other minority student groups act together to work on issues. We were kind of trying to relate that to the CFJS and what we do," he said, adding that he hopes to help unite other student groups at Queen's.

Shira Fenyes, vice-president of programming at CFJS and the retreat organizer, sees this as an important goal, both nationally and locally.

"We're really taken an interest in reaching out to other student groups," said Fenyes, 20, adding that CFJS president Aaron Vomberg attended the Assembly of First Nations National Youth Council this past July.

"We're hoping it'll be a long-lasting relationship…: We come from such a multicultural society," she said.

Fenyes, a third-year political studies major at the University of Saskatchewan, said the goal for this year's conference was to provide a forum for campus leaders.

"The goal of the conference was to bring Jewish student leaders together and… to give them tools and ideas and training that they could bring back to their campuses," she said.

For Fenyes, Camp Gesher was an ideal environment for the retreat.

"It really provided a setting that was conducive to this type of retreat. Having a conference at a camp really does change the dynamic, and it was a more relaxed environment," she said.

For Alexandra Izso, 20, president of Carleton University's Hillel, the retreat was an important learning experience.

"We had a lot of advocacy training workshops and Jewish identity workshops. We discussed what Israel means to us and touched upon volunteering and building coalitions with other groups on campus," said Izso, a third-year student in international relations and economics.

"I definitely learned a lot, especially coming from fellow students who have had experience in the past with campus politics."

Izso, who hopes to bring a larger variety of Jewish programming to her campus this year, appreciates the social connections she gained from the trip.

"I've met people from all over the country who are in the same shoes as I am, and people who have done this previously. I've networked and built relationships," she said. "I really enjoyed it."

Eat, pray, learn: my summer in Israel

By KORTNEY SHAPIRO

Guest Voice

"You're joining Jewish history, you're adding your chapter," McGill University professor Gil Troy told our group, a contingent of university students from all corners of the world, as we sat in the King Solomon Hotel in Jerusalem this past June.

Troy told us that there are two intifadahs occurring on our university campuses today: the "campus intifadah," the distorted and manipulated information about Israel that is disseminated outside the classroom, and the "academic intifadah," in which Israel is delegitimized as a country in textbooks and conferences.

Like many other Jewish 20-somethings, I spent this past summer in Israel. I began my travels with a group of students from all over the world, who were selected to be a part of the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America's (CAMERA) leadership and advocacy training mission. The trip was geared to give students a better understanding of Israeli history and the Arab-Israeli conflict. Through CAMERA, we met with Knesset members, journalists and leading members of the community.

We visited the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, where we met with Daniel Gordis, the centre's vice-president and the author of Saving Israel: How the Jewish State Can Win a War that May Never End. Gordis said that North American university students and activists are advocating during a difficult time on campus, in which the State of Israel and its supporters are under constant attack. That afternoon, as we made our way to Tel Aviv to lie on the beach, Gordis' words remained with me.

The stinging reality check of our meeting with Gordis was countered by an overwhelming sense of tranquility amid the perpetual tension as we stood in Tel Aviv in Independence Hall, the site of the signing of Israel's Declaration of Independence.

During the remainder of my advocacy mission, I learned the significance of the stones in the underground tunnels of the Old City of Yerushalayim and went rafting down the Jordan River. I listened to Israeli soldiers who at my age seemed wiser than most of my peers, discussing their daily routines while stationed at the Lebanese border, where there is a Hezbollah village.

In late June, I travelled throughout the country with friends, visiting the Baha'i Gardens in Haifa and the lush hillsides of Srigim, where a number of my family members live. I ate meals in Tzuba, a kibbutz near Jerusalem where my cousins live and swam in a natural spring during a road trip to the Golan.

I am thankful to have had a summer that has encompassed more than I thought imaginable. Although my trip was both for pleasure and education, I understand now more than ever the significance of my voice as a young advocate during these critical and trying times.

The efforts to demonize the State of Israel have increased exponentially on university and college campuses worldwide, and it is imperative that young leaders within the community speak up. I have come to realize that the ongoing fight for truth and justice is concerned not only with recruiting freshmen students and utilizing community leaders for the perpetual defence of the State of Israel. The fight also includes believing so strongly in a country that regardless of how trying and exhausting the struggle may be, we refuse to give up.

Kortney Shapiro is a fourth-year student at McGill University and McGill Hillel's Holocaust Education Week director.

Spotlight on old-timers in small-town Saskatchewan

By CHANA THAU
Special to The CJN

People typically think of Canadian Jews as living in large urban centres – in fact, many started out in rural settings, although few stayed there.

As part of an oral history project for the Jewish Heritage Society of Western Canada (with funding from the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and Manitoba Heritage Grants Program), I set out in mid-August on a road trip to Estevan, in southeast Saskatchewan.

The purpose of this trip was to interview Gertie Lev, the last Jew in Estevan. Before I left, I asked her what there was to see in Hirsch, 18 miles east of Estevan, other than the Jewish cemetery. The Hirsch Agricultural Colony, which was funded by and named for French baron Maurice de Hirsch, was established in 1892.

"Oh," came the reply, "there are the bachelor brothers, the Kleimans."

And so it was that I came to visit Harvey and Jack Kleiman, whose parents had been part of the Hirsch Colony, an Orthodox farming community.

The brothers, now in their 80s, live independently in the small farmhouse where they were raised. They have a second, newer home, but that is "for guests." Although they no longer farm, but rather lease out their land, they are far from retired. "Just tired," quips Harvey.

Everyone in the area knows them, so I had no trouble getting directions to the farm. When I arrived, Jack, the younger brother, was just getting off the tractor mower after mowing the large tract of land on which they live.

I interviewed them in the kitchen, an odd mix of old and new, accompanied by the hum of their huge Massey-Harris chest freezer. (The family used to sell Massey-Harris farm machinery, among their many business endeavours.) They have a fax-photocopier combination and a laptop "for doing spreadsheets" for their oil business.

When asked about their childhood in Hirsch, both mentioned that early on, there had been "a lot of Jewish people – maybe as many as 250 at one time". There were three synagogues and two kosher butchers. "We had fresh meat twice a week," and since there was no refrigeration, the meat was kept "down the well or in an ice house."

The colony had a rabbi and Jewish teachers. "We wouldn't get home until six," Harvey complains, since they had two hours of Jewish school after public school every day except Shabbat, and two hours on Sunday morning. Sometimes the Jewish teacher would come to the house and sometimes their family would board a teacher. Many of the secular school-teachers were also Jewish.

Harvey had his bar mitzvah at the synagogue in Hirsch and continued to leig tfillin daily with his maternal grandfather for a few years. Unfortunately, by the time it was Jack's turn, there was no longer a rabbi or teacher, so he did not have a bar mitzvah.

Gertie Lev

The school consisted of two rooms, with 60 students and two teachers. Harvey completed Grade 12, although the higher grades had to be done by correspondence with assistance from the teacher. Jack did not get to complete high school, as he was needed on the farm.

When asked whether they ever thought of leaving the farm, the response was, "We were always too busy, that was the problem." Throughout their lives, the brothers did not encounter any anti-Semitism. "We were well-respected, even in Estevan, because all the business we [did] was honourable. If we had a commitment, we looked after it."

Although they have connections with other Jews in Regina and with their sisters in Winnipeg, they rarely leave the farm these days. Various Jewish people come to visit the cemetery and, having heard of the Kleimans, drop in on them too.

"We might move to Estevan – for the winter anyway," says Harvey. "We can't shovel the snow anymore."

Next, I went to Estevan to meet Gertie Lev, the only other Jew in the area. This petite, outgoing woman welcomed me warmly to the yellow bungalow she has lived in since arriving in Estevan 39 years ago. Lev came to Estevan because of her marriage to Morris Lev, her third husband, a farmer in Hirsch. Gertie was a widow who was set up with Morris by a friend.

Gertie was raised in a non-religious home; she attended Shalom Aleichem School for a couple of years, where she learned to "write and speak Jewish." But it was her move to Estevan that really brought out the Jewish side in her.

Although her parents did not observe the High Holidays, "I have been… since I moved here. Every Friday, I light my Sabbath candles and I say the prayers." She is proud of her Jewish home and heritage, proud to show it off to her many friends.

When asked whether she has thought of moving to a place where there is a Jewish community, she sees no need. She travels to visit her daughter in Arizona and family in Winnipeg, where she goes every year for Rosh Hashanah. She has a community of wonderful friends who mow her lawn, shovel the snow and help with grocery shopping.

Gertie and Morris never encountered any anti-Semitism. They were charter members of the Estevan Multicultural Council, formed in 1977. Gertie proudly recounts how she was invited to participate in the opening ceremonies of this year's Folklorama, a multicultural event to celebrate Manitoba's centennial.

Since it was Friday night, she brought her lace teichl (kerchief) and candelabra and blessed the Shabbat candles. Gertie has always been independent and resourceful. Her house is full of photos, documents and medals honouring her for her volunteerism. From the day she arrived in the town, she "joined everything there was to join. And that's how come I didn't make Morris miserable. I occupied my time while he was farming" six months of the year.

Sadly, Morris passed away in August 1988. "He was a wonderful husband, very kind, very giving, very loving."

Gertie carried on with her volunteer activities "to help fill the void." She has many hobbies, including singing, and treated me to a rendition of the Shalom Song. She loves telling a good joke and, reflecting on her life, concludes, "I've lived a life of happy happenings, with a few sprinkles of sorrow, but what life goes without that?"

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Preparing meals for the sukkah together

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

During the joyous holiday of Sukkot we gather in our sukkah to eat, sing and tell stories, just as our ancestors have done for generations.

Sukkot is a true holiday of bonding as moms, dads and children assemble temporary dwellings of sweet smelling branches and leaves, then decorate them by hanging fruits and vegetables from their "sides" and "ceilings."

Building the sukkah and eating and sleeping inside can be a precious childhood memory.

For New York chef and restaurateur Jeffrey Nathan, Sukkot is a time to practise what he preaches in his book, Jeff Nathan's Family Suppers. In it, he emphasizes the importance of not only eating but also cooking with your children. And that's exactly what he does during Sukkot, when the Nathans assemble the sukkah together and then cook the meals they will eat under its leaves and branches.

"Now that Jackie and Chad are teenagers they're busy with friends and a million activities. But being home on Friday night and Saturday and during the Jewish holidays like Sukkot is sacrosanct.

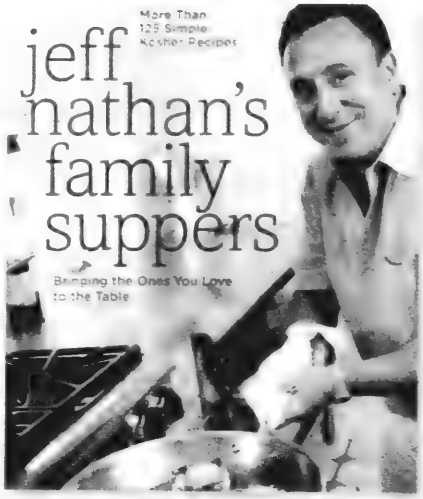
"I love the family feeling of it," Nathan says. "Getting in the kitchen with my wife, Ali, and our kids is our biggest pleasure. I think we're closer because we cook together.

"How many things are there that you can do as a family that are as much fun as cooking?" Nathan asks. "We laugh at our mistakes. I keep reminding them that, as Julia Child said, if something doesn't turn out right, you can just eat it – and nobody else has to know." He smiles.

Since Sukkot celebrates the harvest, it's traditional to serve a variety of autumn fruits and vegetables. A beautiful fresh salad is perfect.

Nathan shares his family tradition of the Salad Mystery Basket.

"We go to the farmers market or the produce section at the supermarket and buy whatever looks the freshest – whether it is bok choy or mesclun or baby carrots. We put everything into a basket, bring it home, and the kids assemble their own salads.



"They're in charge. They make up the recipe, including the dressing. Of course, I'm on the sideline explaining which raw items go together. And what dressing accentuates the flavours.

"But I encourage them to develop their own likes and dislikes. They're learning that everyone's taste is different. And I encourage that. I hate wine snobs. I want them to develop their recipes around whatever is pleasing to them. Don't try to like something just because someone else tells you it's good.

"I want to build their confidence. And their sense of adventure."

"Since we're eating outside during Sukkot, we want dishes which can be transported easily from the kitchen to the sukkah," says Alison, a chef in her own right. "So we do a lot of one-pot meals. We serve hot soup out of a tureen. It's wonderful, as it's often cold in October."

In Israel, stuffed vegetables are a staple during Sukkot. Stuffed peppers, eggplant, mushrooms, squash, tomatoes or onions are great because they come with their own intrinsic container.

"Instead of washing the bowl, you can throw it out," Jeff says with a laugh.

Nathan divides the cooking chores according to each person's talents and likes. Jackie, 14, is very artistic; so she's in charge of stuffing the vegetables and making them look pretty. She also has patience; so she gets the job of cutting the tiny tips off the green beans or spooning out an indentation in the mashed potatoes, filling it with gravy, and then sprinkling herbs all around," Nathan says.

Jackie loves setting the table and arranges the utensils right out of Miss Manners, he adds. But Chad, 17, has no patience – he does the heavy work like getting the barbeque ready, shopping with his dad and putting everything in the dishwasher. He also loves standing over the grill.

"When the kids were younger, I was more hyper and they were intimidated and always afraid of making a mistake. Now, I'm more relaxed so we have more fun," Nathan says.

"You can learn so much in the kitchen," he adds, "from teamwork and co-operation, to planning what to make and figuring out what you'll need. I get to teach them about the importance of eating healthy food – what is healthy – and why they should wash their hands before they start to cook. I've become a real food safety nut," he laughs. "And I always wash my produce carefully with a good fruit and vegetable wash.

"Of course, it's not all just educational; we have fun too. I usually don't tell people – it's kind of our secret – but we have food fights. It's always outside on the deck and it usually involves chocolate mousse. Even there we play our roles. The kids are throwing the mousse at each other. I'm chiding them to stop. But once Ali starts telling the kids to 'get dad,' the game is quickly over," he says with a laugh.

"The best part about cooking together is just looking at their faces as they're tasting something they've made. When we're gathered around the table and I see Jackie beaming about something she's cooked, it's like manna from heaven. She's so happy and proud of herself. And then you know that you're doing something right."

All but the first of the following recipes are from Jeff Nathan's Family Suppers.

GRILLED ASPARAGUS, PAPAYA, AVOCADO AND GRAPEFRUIT ON A BED OF LAMB'S LETTUCE

Prepare the vinaigrette and the vegetables the day before Sukkot. Right before serving, assemble individual salads.

Grapefruit vinaigrette
grated zest of 1 grapefruit
1/4 cup fresh grapefruit juice
2 1/2 tbsp. fresh lime juice
1 tbsp. honey, or less if desired
1/2 tsp. chopped fresh thyme sea salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
1/2 cup extra virgin olive oil

For salad
2 dozen fresh asparagus, trimmed of woody stalks, then grilled
1 large pink grapefruit, peeled, seeded and divided into sections
2 ripe avocados, peeled and diced
1 ripe papaya, peeled, seeded and diced
1/2 cup toasted pine nuts
1 lb. lamb's lettuce (you can substitute Boston lettuce or baby spinach)

Sweet endings for a Sukkot meal

Vinaigrette: Combine grapefruit zest and juice, lime juice and honey in covered container. Shake to emulsify. Slowly whisk in olive oil, salt and pepper for 30 seconds. Allow vinaigrette to sit for at least 1 hour or overnight before serving.

Salad: The day before Sukkot, wash and dry the lettuce and place it with a paper towel in an airtight plastic bag. Working over a medium bowl to catch the juices, supreme the grapefruit by cutting off the thick peel where it meets the flesh, then cutting between the thin membranes to release the segments. Place segments in a bowl and cover with plastic wrap. Splash avocado in the juice, place in bowl with the papaya, and store both bowls in refrigerator overnight.

To serve: place lettucé on individual plates. Artfully arrange asparagus, avocado, grapefruit segments and papaya on top of lettuce. Sprinkle with pine nuts. Pour vinaigrette into small pitchers and place on table for guests to help themselves. Makes 6 servings.

WHITE BEAN SOUP WITH GARLIC AND ROSEMARY

1 lb. dried white kidney (cannellini) beans
1/3 cup plus 2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
4 medium carrots, chopped
2 medium celery ribs, chopped
1 large red or yellow bell pepper, cored, seeded and chopped
12 garlic cloves, chopped
2 ripe plum tomatoes, cut into 1/2 in. dice
1 tbsp. chopped fresh rosemary
1 1/2 tsp. dried oregano
1 tsp. hot red pepper flakes
1 gallon water
kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste

Place beans in large bowl and add enough water to cover beans by 2 inches. Let stand for 8 to 12 hours. Drain well.

Heat oil in a large pot over medium heat. Add onion, carrots, celery, bell pepper and garlic. Cook, stirring often, until vegetables are softened, about 12 minutes. Add the drained beans, tomatoes, rosemary, oregano and red pepper flakes; reduce heat to low. Cook until tomatoes soften, about 7 minutes. Stir in the water. Bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce heat to medium-low. Simmer until beans are very tender, about 1-1/4 hours. During last 15 minutes, season with salt and pepper. In batches, transfer soup to a blender and puree. Transfer to soup tureen and season with salt and pepper. Serve hot.

POACHED APRICOTS WITH LEMON AND THYME

This is the perfect Sukkot dessert – light, beautiful and delicious. Serve this dessert as compote, with regular or non-dairy vanilla ice cream or whipped topping.

2 cups water
1 2 cup fresh orange juice
1 2 cup honey
1 4 cup sugar
zest and juice of 1 lemon
1 3-in. cinnamon stick
1 lb. dried apricots
1/4 cup almond-flavoured liqueur
1 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
a few gratings of fresh nutmeg non-dairy vanilla ice cream or whipped topping, for serving lemon zest, cut into julienne, for serving

Combine 2 cups water, orange juice, honey, sugar, lemon zest and juice and cinnamon in a medium saucepan. Add apricots; bring to a simmer over medium heat, stirring occasionally. Partially cover the saucepan with the lid; simmer until apricots are tender, about 10 minutes.

Remove from heat and add liqueur, thyme and nutmeg. Cool until warm (or cool, cover and refrigerate until chilled). Serve, spooned over ice cream and topped with julienne lemon zest, if desired. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

SICILIAN-STYLE STUFFED BELL PEPPERS

4 sweet bell peppers, red, yellow, orange or green stemmed, halved, deveined and seeded
1 cup Italian-seasoned dry bread crumbs
1/3 cup plus 1 tbsp. golden raisins, plumped and drained
6 boneless anchovy fillets, finely chopped
1/4 cup capers, drained and rinsed
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
1 cup extra-virgin olive oil, plus more as needed
freshly ground black pepper to taste
1/2 cup canned tomato sauce, as needed

Preheat oven to 400. Lightly oil a large baking sheet. Place peppers skin side down on the sheet. In a medium bowl, mix together bread crumbs, raisins, anchovies, capers, parsley and basil. Add oil and stir well to make a crumbly mixture the texture of wet sand. Season with pepper. Spread bread crumb mixture in a thin layer onto the cut surface of each pepper. Drizzle each with a bit of olive oil and top with tomato sauce. Bake until peppers are wilted and the crumb filling is golden brown, about 25 minutes. Serve hot, cool or at room temperature. Makes 4 servings.

Winnipeg community goes green

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With the launch of EcoShift, Dov and Sara Allentuck Secter have staked their claim to a leadership role in the Jewish community here.

"We lead green lives at home and are passionate about safeguarding the environment," says Allentuck Secter, a 27-year-old teacher.

"Dov [a 33-year-old architect] and I weren't seeing much interest in environmental issues in the organized Jewish community. So we thought we would do something to promote environmental awareness within the community."

What the young couple came up with was EcoShift, a daylong series of eco activities to take place at Asper Jewish Community Campus, on Sept. 26. The event aims to educate the community members about the importance of incorporating green behaviours into their daily lives. The program will include composting and recycling and home retrofit demonstrations, environmental activities for children and a green vendor showcase featuring exhibits by local businesses. The highlight of the day will be an appearance by David Suzuki, Canada's best known environmentalist, speaking at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue in the evening.

"We thought we would start off with something small," Allentuck Secter says, "but this has really blossomed. We are hoping to have at least 700 people for Dr. Suzuki's presentation and several hundred more participating in the activities we have planned during the day."

Sarah Allentuck Secter and Dov Secter

The Secters hope that Ecoshift will lead to community organizations implementing environmental initiatives and the expansion of the green agendas of those that already have them.

"EcoShift can act as a catalyst for these changes while raising the profile of our Jewish community's role in sustainable initiatives within the city of Winnipeg," Allentuck Secter says. "With tikkun olam as a core Jewish value, the individuals and organizations in Jewish Winnipeg should be paving the way for a more sustainable future."

While the young couple have been involved in the community previously as canvassers for Combined Jewish Appeal campaigns and have attended Young Leadership conferences in Toronto, EcoShift marks the first time they have ever taken on a venture of this magnitude. "It has been a challenge," Allentuck Secter says, "but it has been rewarding. We have had a lot of support from the Jewish Federation [of Winnipeg] and we have good people on our committee."

Allentuck Secter's mother, Sharon Allentuck, is a longtime CJA volunteer and a former president of the Winnipeg chapter of the National Council of Jewish Women and a national board member.

The couple and their committee organized EcoShift under the auspices of J-PEG, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Next Generation Leadership Division. J-PEG's mandate is to involve adults between the ages of 25 and 45 who live in Winnipeg in community events, leadership development programs and fundraising initiatives to support local and overseas Jewish communities.

Researchers discover gene for chronic pain

ISRAEL21c staff

JERUSALEM — A gene affecting chronic pain caused by nerve injury has been identified by Israeli and international researchers, offering hope of new treatments for sufferers everywhere.

Chronic pain affects approximately 20 per cent of adults worldwide and includes persistent headaches, back pain, arthritis and even psychogenic pain, where doctors are unable to find the cause of constant pain.

While it is recognized that some people are more susceptible to chronic pain than others, no one knows why. Given the same injury and the same operation, people will suffer variable degrees of pain, even under nearly identical circumstances.

Now, researchers at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, University of Toronto, Sanofi-Aventis in Germany and the Karolinska Institute Center for Oral Biology in Sweden, believe they may have found the answer in genetics.

"The immediate significance is the mere awareness that differences in pain perception may have a genetic predisposition," says Ariel Darvasi of the Alexander Silberman Institute of Life Sciences at Hebrew University.

"Our discovery may provide insights for treating chronic pain through previously unthought-of mechanisms."

In a report published recently in Genome Research, Darvasi and colleagues identified a region of mouse chromosome 15 that likely contained a genetic variant or variants contributing to pain. However, this region contains many genes and the responsible variant remained unknown.

Darvasi and his team, which includes Marshall Devor, a professor at the Hebrew University, undertook two fine-mapping approaches to narrow down the chromosomal locus to an interval of 155 genes. From there, they were able to identify a single gene, Cacgn2, as the likely candidate.

In mouse experiments, the researchers were able to confirm that Cacgn2 has a functional role in pain.

To find out whether the human version of the gene also plays a part in chronic pain, the scientists analyzed a group of breast cancer patients who experienced chronic pain more than six months after they had undergone removal or partial removal of a breast. The researchers found that genetic variants of Cacgn2 were significantly associated with this chronic pain.

While cautioning that this association will need further analysis, the researchers say that the result suggests that this gene is an important factor in experiencing pain.

The work was supported by the Israel Science Foundation, the Hebrew University Center for Research on Pain, the Canada Research Chair Program and the European Community's 6th Framework Program.

Referendum win makes Erdogan second only to Ataturk

By ALON LIEL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Analysis

This is the fourth time Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan has savoured victory in a national ballot. Twice he won general elections, twice he won referenda. He is a perennial "winner," even if we in Israel are largely united in our distaste for him.

On Sunday, voters overwhelmingly approved the referendum initiated by Erdogan's Islamic-oriented Justice and Development Party. The constitutional measures passed give the government wide-ranging power to exert control over the military and judiciary, both traditional bulwarks of the country's secularism.

The referendum result is a triumph for Erdogan's ideology. It's hard to imagine the heads of Turkey's army plotting another coup, given that the reforms now allow them to be tried in civilian court, or the country's high court banning certain political parties, as it has in the past.

Erdogan can now look both forward and back with satisfaction. He has made his country richer, more stable and stronger in the international community, while simultaneously making it both more democratic and more devout.

Should Erdogan prevail in the July 2011 election – a legitimate prospect after Sunday's victory – he will become the longest-serving, and most influential, Turkish leader since Kemal Ataturk.

Turkey's Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan

The reforms passed Sunday overturn eight decades of government-touted secular ideology, instilling instead a new political creed that could rightfully be termed Erdoganism. And a leader doesn't have an "ism" attached to his name simply by toeing his predecessors' line.

Many in Turkey and abroad view Turkey's transformation – more religious, more eastward-looking – as cause for concern. But to the majority of Turks, the reforms have made the republic more democratic, more humane.

Erdogan will remain hated by the Turkish secular elite, which is concentrated in the army, universities and business community. But he is beloved by Turkey's poorer, devout periphery. The prime minister has straightened the backbone of the marginalized, and in return has received their undying loyalty.

Fears that Erdogan will turn the country into an Iranian-style Islamic republic are unfounded. Support for the prime minister rests not only on ideology but also on modernization and the prosperity he has helped bring.

We in Israel know Erdogan primarily for his hard-line Mideast policy, less so for his economic platform. But the prime minister's every step is taken with fiscal growth in mind. Erdogan will abandon neither modernization nor democracy, the system allowing his government to stay in power.

The prime minister must now meet one major objective to justify the "ism" that has been appended to his name: create a Kurdish state, or at least recognize Turkey's Kurds as a national minority.

Erdogan is ripe for it, but his country is not. He needs one more term to complete his Kurdish mission. Should he win next July, that may be a real possibility.

Investigation panel seeks Turkish captain's testimony

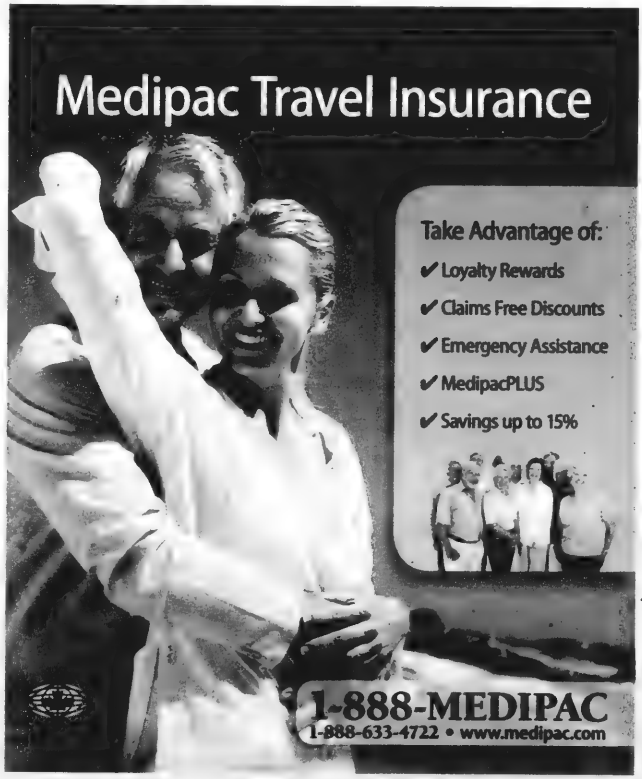
© Haaretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The investigation committee established to probe the deadly clash aboard the Turkish aid ship Mavi Marmara this spring approached the Turkish Embassy here on Sunday seeking to compel the captain of the ship to testify before the committee.

The Mavi Marmara was one of several aid ships aiming to deliver supplies to Gaza in violation of an Israeli naval blockade. In an effort to prevent it from reaching Gaza, Israeli navy commandos boarded the ship on May 31, and were met with violence. Nine Turkish activists were killed in the ensuing clash. Israel appointed a commission of investigation, headed by former justice Jacob Turkel, to probe the incident.

The panel's co-ordinator, attorney Hoshea Gottlieb, submitted an official request to the Turkish Embassy in Israel: "The public commission to examine the maritime incident of May 31, 2010, wishes to invite Mr. Halid Terzi, who served as the captain of the Mavi Marmara during the incident which the committee is examining, in order to hear his testimony regarding the incident."

On Monday, the chair of Israel's National Security Council, Uzi Arad, testified before the Turkel committee behind closed doors. Mossad director Meir Dagan was expected to testify on Tuesday, and Foreign Ministry director general Yossi Gal was scheduled to testify later this week.



Israel Briefs

Castro criticizes Ahmadinejad

Israeli media reported that Cuban leader Fidel Castro criticized Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for denying the Holocaust and promoting anti-Semitism. In a wide-ranging interview with Atlantic reporter Jeffrey Goldberg, Castro, a frequent critic of Israel, said the Iranian government could encourage peace by acknowledging the "unique" history of anti-Semitism and trying to understand why Israelis fear for their existence. "I think their culture and religion kept them together as a nation," Castro said of the Jewish people, adding that "the Jews have lived an existence that is much harder than ours. There is nothing that compares to the Holocaust." Castro said he does not believe Iran will back down on its pursuit of nuclear weapons, despite sanctions and threats of an Israeli attack.

"This problem is not going to get resolved, because the Iranians are not going to back down in the face of threats. The Iranian capacity to inflict damage is not appreciated."

Shell fired from Gaza

A mortar shell fired from Gaza exploded between two day-care centres in a southern Israeli kibbutz. The shell landed on the morning of Sept. 8, shortly before the children were supposed to arrive. Several teachers were in the buildings at the time of the attack. There were no injuries, though one of the buildings reportedly sustained damage. It was the third rocket fired from Gaza in the past three days. A Qassam rocket fired from Gaza struck Sderot at 2 a.m. on Sept. 7. The attacks come following the start of direct peace negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians on Sept. 2.

Hamas threatens the PA

Hamas said it would strike the Palestinian Authority if the PA does not stop arresting its West Bank followers. In an announcement released on Sept. 8 and reported by Israel Radio, Hamas threatened the Palestinian Authority. "You know that the hands that have reached the heart of the occupier can reach you, too," the announcement said, adding that Hamas can strike anytime and anywhere it wants. The announcement by the terrorist group came after PA President Mahmoud Abbas' security forces arrested at least six Hamas suspects in two attacks on Israelis driving in the West Bank last week. Four Israelis were killed in a shooting attack near Hebron on Aug. 31, and two were injured in a similar attack near Ramallah the next day. Hamas stepped up its attacks on Israeli targets following the launch of direct peace negotiations.

Kent has working tour of Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Thornhill MP Peter Kent, Canadian minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), recently wrapped up an eight-day mission to Israel.

While there, Kent discussed matters of joint Canadian-Israeli interest, including Canada and Israel's involvement with Latin America countries, with Israeli President Shimon Peres, Minister of Foreign Affairs Avigdor Lieberman and Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs Danny Ayalon.

In Venezuela, Israeli interests have been represented by the Canadian Embassy in Caracas since President Hugo Chavez expelled Israeli diplomats from the country in early 2009.

Congressional elections, which are due to take place in Venezuela this month, have been preceded by a string of anti-Semitic attacks by the state media. "We are seeing again finger-pointing and incitement against the Jewish population, the sort of anti-Semitism that flared during the Gaza incursion in 2009," said Kent, whose talks with Israeli representatives focused on the security of Venezuela's Jewish population. "This would be a concern for Canada even if we didn't formally represent Israel's interests."

Since 1973, Canada has also represented Israel's interests in Cuba through its embassy in Havana. "Our talks centred on the small, vibrant Jewish community in Cuba and the easing of the Castro regime's anti-religious tendencies," said Kent, who was last in Cuba visiting the 1,500-member Jewish community this past November, when 10 Jews – two families – departed for Israel.

"It's now possible for Cuban Jews to make aliyah," Kent said on Sept. 7, his final day in Israel before returning to Canada.

"While Canada represents Israel's interests on political and diplomatic levels, the UJA [Federation of Greater Toronto] and other Canadian Jewish organizations make regular missions to Cuba, and since there are no rabbis [or other community officials], these missions are very important," he said.

Canada and Israel are also working together to pressure the government of Argentina to make reparations for the botched investigation of the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires.

Meanwhile, in Panama, which is a thriving democracy with a growing economy and a strong Jewish community, Canadian-Israeli interests are economic.

Latin American security is also a matter of joint Canadian-Israeli concern. As permanent observers of the Organization of American States, both Canada and Israel are involved in tackling the region's transnational crime, including drug trafficking, an issue that made it onto the agenda of the G8 countries' meeting in the Muskoka region of Ontario in June.

Another area of Canadian and Israeli mutual interest is the involvement of Latin states with Iran. "We share concerns about Iran's contacts in Latin American governments, and we had the opportunity to talk about [how to enforce] UN Security Council Resolution 1929," said Kent, referring to the resolution that was adopted in June involving sanctions against Iran.

While in Israel, Kent met with Palestinian Authority Minister of Foreign Affairs Riad Malki, to review progress on Canada's $300-million assistance package to support PA efforts in the areas of security and justice development over the next five years.

Kent said the lion's share of the funds is going toward the training of a national security force, with the rest being spent on the creation of civil and criminal justice systems, justice training, institution building and institutional renovations, including the construction of courthouses and other justice facilities, in preparation for eventual Palestinian independence.

"We are delighted with our returns so far," said Kent, who visited the central security operation centre in Ramallah, from which PA police and national security forces will communicate and co-ordinate operations between each other domestically, and with Israeli security forces.

The centre is now partly functional, and has already proven effective, as evidenced by PA forces' improved reaction to the terror attacks that took place in the West Bank on Aug. 31. "The communication, co-ordination and response were much improved," he said.

The attacks were clearly aimed at derailing the current peace talks, he added. "They were aimed as much at Palestinians who dream of peaceful coexistence with Israel as they were aimed at those who died. It is clear that the attacks were meant as an obstruction to those who want to travel the road of peace."

Kent said that he was heartened by PA President Mahmoud Abbas' rejections, both of the attacks and of [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's demonization of the peace talks.

"Democracy, freedom, rule of law is a work in progress everywhere," he said. "The work [with the PA] is positive and will yield benefits if these institutions are bolstered in preparation for that day [of Palestinian independence]."

Kent, a former journalist, has been to Israel several times – the first time in 1973, to cover the Yom Kippur War for CTV. But this was his first trip to Israel as a cabinet minister.

He said the Canadian government's support of Israel in the face of terrorism is unwavering. "Our government – Prime Minister Harper – has made it very clear that there is no moral equivalence between terrorism and democracy. Israel has a right to peace and security, and to defend its borders and ensure that terrorist contraband doesn't find its way to the Gaza Strip."

"Certainly not all democracies have been as outspoken as Canada, but Canada doesn't apologize for that at all. The position of our government has been very clear and constant," Kent said. "There is a spectrum of constituent policy decisions that we have taken that are based on principle, not on politics. We base our decisions on international law, human rights and justice."

Finesse needed with 'difficult' Iran: Russian senator

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

MOSCOW — Russian nuclear energy support is intended to encourage Iran to play by global arms rules, a top Moscow senator said on Sunday, arguing that Tehran's hardline Islamists responded best to diplomatic "chess," not "rugby."

Describing the Islamic republic as a difficult neighbour, Mikhail Margelov, chair of the foreign affairs committee of the Federation Council of Russia, or upper parliament chamber, said Moscow has no hidden agenda in building and supplying fuel to Iran's first nuclear power plant.

Russia's role at the plant, inaugurated last month near the Gulf city of Bushehr, was aimed at securing Iranian compliance with the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN body that seeks to counter nuclear proliferation, he said.

"We do not have any illusions about the character of the Iranian regime at all," he told a Geneva meeting of the International Institute of International Studies think-tank.

"That is why, if we co-operate with Iran in the field of nuclear energy when we do Bushehr, this is how we try to keep these guys playing by the rules of the IAEA."

"This is the only legal mechanism to keep them co-operating with the international institutions."

Western countries fear Iran is seeking to develop nuclear weapons, but Tehran rejects the accusation, saying its atomic activities are peaceful and aimed at generating electricity.

To ease proliferation concerns, Russia will take back spent rods that could be used to make weapons-grade plutonium.

Margelov suggested a delicate factor in the Kremlin's approach to Iran is concern about potential Islamist subversion among Russia's Muslim minorities.

"We have to play chess with them. We do not believe, in our Oriental policy, in playing rugby," he said.

"They are our neighbour – our difficult neighbour… It's difficult to do politics in the Oriental countries, and we know that."

The Kremlin is struggling to contain a growing Islamist insurgency in its North Caucasus region. Chechen rebel leader Doku Umarov this month called on militants in heavily Muslim Tatarstan and Bashkortostan, in central Russia where there has been very little violence linked to Islam, to conduct attacks.

Iran remains under intense international pressure to stop uranium enrichment, something the West says it no longer needs to do, since it can acquire nuclear fuel from abroad.

Moscow is also struggling to balance trade ties with Tehran and warmer relations with the United States, which is eager for Kremlin support to rein in Iranian nuclear activities.

Tehran's refusal to cease enrichment has resulted in a series of UN sanctions and tougher unilateral measures by the United States, the European Union and others.

In a report earlier this month, the IAEA said Iran is pressing on with its nuclear program in defiance of the sanctions and hampering the UN nuclear watchdog's work by barring some inspectors.

Iran has voiced anger over Moscow's backing of the sanctions in the Security Council, where Russia holds veto power.

Tehran continues to defy UN

"We request the director general to immediately reconsider this sort of reporting… so that it will not create political tensions," said Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's chief delegate to the IAEA.

The IAEA report noted that Iran continued to enrich uranium in defiance of five UN Security Council resolutions, and focused in greater detail on issues mentioned Monday by Amano – lack of progress on the IAEA probe of the purported arms program experiments and Tehran's recent decision to strip two inspectors of their monitoring rights after they reported what they said were undeclared nuclear experiments.

While all member states select inspectors from an official IAEA list, some western nations on the agency's 35-nation board argue that because Iran has banned more than 40 inspectors over the past four years, a case could be made that Tehran is violating the agency's stated Safeguards Agreements.

The agreements are meant to ensure that the IAEA can monitor Iran's nuclear program without impediment, to ensure that it is solely for peaceful purposes.

Beyond Iran, the board – and a subsequent assembly of the 151 IAEA member nations – will focus on allegations of a hidden Syrian nuclear program, something Syria denies. Israel, which is commonly considered to have nuclear arms, is also on the agenda, with Islamic nations pushing Israel to open its atomic activities to IAEA perusal.

Netanyahu to offer partial settlement freeze

By AVI ISSACHAROFF and BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu seeks to adopt a policy identical to that of his predecessor for construction in West Bank settlements – a partial freeze – as the Sept. 30 end of the moratorium approaches

Under Ehud Olmert, more than 90 per cent of construction was carried out in the major settlement blocs – Ma'aleh Adumim, Gush Etzion and Ariel.

Netanyahu will be going to Sharm el-Sheikh in Egypt tomorrow for the second round of direct negotiations with the Palestinians, where he will be joined by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

The Palestinians have said they will quit the talks if the settlement freeze does not continue, and a senior Palestinian source says this remains their firm position.

Before the 2007 summit meeting in Annapolis, Md., Olmert reached an understanding with the Bush administration that there would be a partial construction freeze in West Bank Jewish settlements. The understanding provided that Israel would not limit construction in Jewish neighbourhoods of east Jerusalem, but would not build in Arab neighbourhoods.

Netanyahu has already embraced that policy in Jerusalem following the crisis with the United States in March over construction in the Ramat Shlomo neighbourhood.

Olmert had committed to U.S. president George W. Bush that construction in isolated settlements outside the settlement blocs and east of the separation barrier would be permitted only in built-up areas, so no settlements would be expanded or new land settled. In that context, virtually no new construction was undertaken in isolated settlements other than public buildings and a small number of new houses.

Olmert also committed that in the large settlement blocs, construction would be permitted beyond built-up areas but only just beyond their perimeter. As a result, thousands of new housing units were put up in Ma'aleh Adumim, Beitar Ilit, Modi'in Ilit and Gush Etzion.

Olmert also committed that unauthorized outposts would not be expanded because they were due to be evacuated. Responsibility for supervising compliance with the understandings was given to Olmert's political adviser, Shalom Turgeman, and defense minister Ehud Barak.

According to a senior official in Jerusalem involved in contacts with the U.S. administration, Netanyahu presented his plan to implement Olmert's policy to Mitchell, President Barack Obama and Clinton.

Netanyahu hinted at the approach at a meeting on Sunday with Likud cabinet ministers and expanded on it in a meeting with Tony Blair, the representative of the Middle East Quartet, which comprises the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia. Nonetheless, Netanyahu did not tell Blair or the Americans that construction criteria would be based on distinguishing between settlements based on their geographic location.

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

"The freeze order is due to expire, and we have to think about what is the wise thing to do," Netanyahu said, adding that the potential exists to build 19,000 housing units. "But I believe that in practice what will be built will be much less. We will not agree to be dictated to that nothing will be built."

At his meeting with Blair, Netanyahu said Israel cannot continue with an absolute settlement freeze, explaining that Israel would not build tens of thousands of housing units that are in the planning stages, but would not suspend the lives of Jewish residents of the West Bank.

Netanyahu also said he did not accept the Palestinian approach that if there is no complete freeze, they would leave the talks. The international community views the settlement freeze issue as a test of Israel's seriousness, Netanyahu said, but added that Israel also had tests for the seriousness of the Palestinians, such as recognizing Israel as a Jewish state.

The Israeli prime minister told the cabinet that Palestinian recognition of Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish people would be critical to reaching a peace agreement.

"We are saying that the solution is two states for two peoples," Netanyahu said. "To my regret, I am still not hearing the phrase 'two states for two peoples' from the Palestinians. I am hearing them say 'two states,' but I am not hearing them recognize two states for two peoples."

A Film Unfinished plumbs the bitter depths of the Holocaust

A Jewish policeman arrests a man in a Nazi-ordered roundup in the Warsaw ghetto.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yael Hersonski's A Film Unfinished is an extraordinary cinematic document from the bitter depths of the Holocaust.

Hersonski, an Israeli, has taken a notorious Nazi propaganda film on the Warsaw ghetto, Das Ghetto, known already to archivists and historians, and bulked it up by adding personal commentary and additional footage.

Hersonski's 88-minute documentary opens in Toronto on Sept. 23 at the newly opened Bell Lightbox. It is by turns riveting, horrifying and heartbreaking.

In May 1942, about two months before many of the ghetto's Jewish inhabitants were deported to and murdered in the Treblinka death camp in Poland, the Nazis dispatched a film crew into the overcrowded ghetto, hoping to compile a celluloid record of it before its liquidation. Das Ghetto, however, was not completed, much less edited.

Found in a German archive in 1954, Das Ghetto, apparently the longest documentary movie ever filmed in the Warsaw ghetto, was widely regarded as historically accurate. In fact, some of its pivotal scenes were deliberately staged and sanitized to distort reality and thereby mislead viewers.

Cynical as always, the Nazis had an agenda, hoping that Das Ghetto would be accepted as the gospel truth about the lives of Jews in the Warsaw ghetto.

Hersonski shatters their machinations, blending raw footage with sharp observations and revealing interviews with both Jewish survivors and the German cameraman who shot Das Ghetto.

One of the most striking documentaries ever to emerge from the Holocaust, A Film Unfinished takes you into the inferno that was the ghetto.

Approximately 500,000 Jews were crammed into the ghetto, which was less than three square miles in size. A miserable holding pen until its ragged inmates could be deported and killed, it was plagued by rampant hunger and disease. Given its inhumane conditions, tens of thousands of Jews died before they could be deported.

After the 1942 roundups, 100,000 Jews remained in the ghetto. When the Nazis ordered further deportations in 1943, the ghetto erupted in revolt. The rebellion was mercilessly crushed.

The most unforgettable images in A Film Unfinished are those of famished Jews staring listlessly into the camera. They must have realized that their chances of survival were nonexistent. Their faces speak volumes.

There are also flickering images of street crowds, beggars clad in rags, well-dressed people walking jauntily on strolls, corpses littering streets, trams gliding by silently on tracks, rickshaws carrying passengers and horse-drawn carts transporting a variety of goods. Occasionally the images bubble up, almost dissolving on screen.

The staged scenes bespeak a cynicism of profound proportions.

Adam Czerniakow, the ghetto's chief elder who committed suicide just two days prior to the 1942 deportations, is filmed in his office greeting a delegation of bearded Orthodox Jews. As Hersonski observes in her narration, Czerniakow recounted this faux encounter in his diary.

In a bid to "beautify" the ghetto, the Germans shot footage of a nightclub, a restaurant and a shop.

The nightclub flows with champagne and is filled with patrons dancing to the beat of a band. In the restaurant, seemingly prosperous couples dine to their heart's content. A woman enters a well-stocked store. These outrageous make-believe scenes leave the impression that life is good in the ghetto.

The roaming camera also pans on Jewish policemen arresting Jews (the oppressors and the oppressed would both be murdered in due course), a ritual circumcision ceremony (pity the Jewish baby who had the misfortune of being born in 1942), and Talmud Torah students deep in the throes of their studies (we can safely assume that they did not survive the Nazi occupation).

In a compelling clip, naked men, followed by nude women, immerse themselves in a common mikvah. This stunning display of immodesty is obviously designed to embarrass and humiliate Jews.

These fabricated scenes were shot by Willy Wist, who become a scrap metal dealer after the Second World War and died in 1999. In a reconstructed interview in German in which an actor plays Wist, he claims that he had no inkling of the Holocaust in progress. In passing, he complains that the lighting in the mikvah was poor.

Jewish survivors who lived in the ghetto as children and young adults react to Das Ghetto and recall their lives there in vivid testimony.

A Film Unfinished is like a sponge, absorbing the indignities, the deprivations, the deaths and the hopelessness of the Warsaw ghetto.

A sharp critique of Israel's occupation

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Miral, screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last week, merges the story of four strong-willed Palestinian women with a sharp critique of Israel's occupation of the West Bank.

The focus of Julian Schnabel's feature film, adapted from a book by Rula Jebreal, is Hind Husseini (Hiam Abbass), a Jerusalem-based educator from a prominent Palestinian family who establishes an orphanage and school for Palestinian children in 1948. Husseini wants to give them a secure home, a sound education and an unwavering Palestinian identity.

As this politically infused film partially unfolds through newsreel footage against the backdrop of Israel's birth and the violence of the Arab-Israeli conflict, the second character, Nadia (Yasmine Ali Massri), an Israeli Arab from Jaffa, is introduced. A victim of sexual abuse, she is arrested after a racist incident on an Israeli bus. The third character, Fatima (Ruba Blal), a Palestinian nurse and would-be terrorist, carries a bomb into an Israeli movie theatre, hoping to strike a blow for her people's cause.

Nadia's daughter, Miral (Freida Pinto), completes the circle of Palestinian women. For reasons that later become clear, Miral's father, Jamal, an Israeli Arab cleric (Alexander Siddig), entrusts her upbringing to Husseini. In time, Miral and Husseini form a mutually affectionate relationship.

The first Palestinian uprising erupts in 1987, and Miral falls in love with one of its leaders, Hani (Omar Metwally). Considering herself a Palestinian rather than an Israeli Arab, Miral is a passionate nationalist. Husseini, fearing that her orphanage may be closed by the Israeli authorities if Miral becomes personally involved in the intifadah, urges her to remain on the sidelines.

Miral, which is dedicated to people who think that peace, or a two-state solution, is possible between Israelis and Palestinians, is thoroughly pro-Palestinian in its sympathies.

Hani, the Palestinian militant whose views eventually take a somewhat dovish turn, is the primary vehicle for articulating the Palestinian position. He compares the Jewish settlers in the West Bank to a cancer, blames them for the impasse and says they want to get rid of the Palestinians in the West Bank. As well, he complains that new Jewish immigrants have more rights than native-born Palestinians.

The Israeli Jews in Miral come off as heavies. An Israeli army patrol storms into a Palestinian refugee camp, while a bulldozer demolishes a house. No reason is given for the raid or the destruction of the building. Miral, having been accused of belonging to an "enemy organization," is mercilessly whipped by an Israeli policewoman.

While Miral rallies wholeheartedly behind the plight of the stateless Palestinians, whose grievances must be addressed, it gives Israel and Israeli Jews short shrift, which is patently unfair.

Toronto cantor featured in new documentary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Cantor Simon Spiro visited Poland for the first time in July 2009 with trepidation.

The cantor of Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation had talked about going there with his late father, whose parents and four siblings all perished in the Holocaust. Spiro and his father never made the trip, but the point of last year's Cantors' Assembly mission to Poland and Israel, in which Spiro took part, was for participants to use music as a healing tool.

A 52-year-old native of London, England, Spiro is one of half a dozen cantors featured in a 91-minute documentary about the 2009 trip, 100 Voices: A Journey Home (100voicesmovie.com). The film also features composer Charles Fox, whose songs include Killing Me Softly With His Song and I Got a Name.

Spiro will introduce the film and stay for a question-and-answer session following the premiere, a one-night-only screening, at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande Cinemas on Sept. 20 at 7 p.m.

The timing, immediately following the Toronto International Film Festival, is coincidental, said Spiro in an interview at his home. The film will be also be screened at SilverCity Richmond Hill, and Cineplex Odeon Varsity Cinemas. Information about screenings in Ottawa and Montreal is available at www.cineplex.com/events.

As well, the movie, which highlights the resurgence of Jewish culture in Poland, is being screened from Sept. 22 to 28 in New York and Los Angeles to qualify for Academy Awards consideration, and on Sept. 21 only, in almost 500 American cities.

The Cantors Assembly, which is affiliated with the Conservative movement, is the largest cantors' organization in the world.

Participating cantors were accompanied by congregants, including a Toronto contingent organized by Spiro's wife Aliza, herself a Conservative cantor who now works as a singer and songwriter.

Cantors Beny Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple and Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Synagogue also took part.

Among the most memorable parts of the trip for Spiro was an evening at Warsaw's opera house. There's never been Jewish music there, he said. That night, the Polish national anthem and Hatikvah were both on the program.

Thousands of Polish non-Jews attended the event, Aliza said.

The program started with non-Jewish children from Poland singing Ani Ma'amin, together with Jewish children from California.

Spiro, who performed cantorial music "exactly the way it was on the original record recorded in 1920," said that the evening was "amazing."

The film also shows a memorial service at the gates of Auschwitz, paying tribute to the 1,300 cantors who perished in the Holocaust.

Poland – Warsaw in particular – was the epicentre of Yiddishkeit before the war, said Spiro, who experienced "a roller coaster" of emotions when he was there.

Thinking about his father's carefree childhood, he was disheartened by the staggering loss of Jewish life, and particularly by the contrast between badly neglected Jewish cemeteries and lovingly tended Catholic ones. As well, he said, there was guilt that accompanied lighter moments.

But Spiro said he had to go back to bear witness and pay homage to those who perished. "Every Jewish person must go there," he said. This year, he and Aliza returned to Poland with a group of 45 people to show them what the 2009 group had seen. He said it was easier the second time, although it was still difficult.

"It's not about who won and who lost," said Spiro. "But I have to be [there] with a kippah on my head. The Holocaust is the largest calamity that ever befell the Jewish people, and I'm here."

Leonard Cohen's '72 tour documented on DVD

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

It's April 21, 1972, and Leonard Cohen is backstage weeping, visibly moved after an emotional concert in Jerusalem that ended a 20-city European tour.

The month-long tour was filmed by veteran English filmmaker Tony Palmer and released in 1974 as Bird on a Wire. After a brief, limited run, the movie seemingly disappeared. However, last year the original raw footage was re-discovered and Palmer was able to restore this historic movie for DVD release

Bird on a Wire is an amazing documentary of the Canadian troubadour in his prime. Palmer was given complete and intimate access to Cohen, filming him on stage, backstage, on the bus and in hotel rooms. In one scene, we see Cohen sitting on the ground, smoking a hookah in the Old City of Jerusalem, taking it all in like any other tourist.

Poster advertising the Israeli shows

The movie begins a couple days before the Jerusalem concert, at a sport hall in Tel Aviv where Cohen is performing. There seems to be a lot of commotion offstage, and we see Cohen berating the hall security "the men in orange" for their heavy-handed tactics in keeping people back from the stage. "Let's not end this in violence," he says. "There's no point in starting a war right now."

"They were nasty, those people," he says backstage about the security after he was forced to end the show early.

Bird on a Wire follows Cohen and his band, which included singer Jennifer Warnes, performing at intimate venues across Europe. It's not just a concert film. The live performances are interspersed with interviews in which Cohen talks about a range of topics. From his voice – "I don't have a good voice, everybody knows that" – to the difficulties of performing personal songs night after night on stage, and to Judaism:

"Are you a practising Jew?" he is asked. "I am always practising," he says. When asked if he knows Hebrew, he says, "I can read the prayers but don't know what they mean."

The film shows see him engaged with a young woman with star-struck eyes who's trying to seduce him after a show in what might be Germany, and a similar incident in Israel, with a woman inviting him to a party. Both times, Cohen turns them down.

Depending on his mood, Cohen frequently engaged in banter with his audiences between songs, inviting them onstage if they couldn't hear him well, or ironically invoking the ghost of Joseph Goebbels, asking his Berlin audience, in German, "Do you want total war?"

At one show he tells his audience, "This is the first day of Passover." When one fan reminds him that it's actually the last day, Cohen laughs. "See, that's how confused I am."

That tour of '72 was marred by numerous sound problems. After one show in Denmark, some fans complained to him offstage that they weren't able to hear anything. Cohen pulls out his wallet and offers to hand them their money back. Amazingly, the fans complain that he's ripping them off with the currency exchange.

It's the final show in Jerusalem that is the most striking. Before the show we clearly see Cohen licking what looks like an LSD blotter. Halfway through the show, Cohen walks off stage, quoting Kabbalah and telling his audience that he just wasn't delivering a good show that night.

Backstage he tells his manager that he isn't going back out and they should give the audience their money back. His manger (I think that's who he is) tries to convince him otherwise. "Some of those people out there didn't want to be in the army and kill people," he tells Cohen. "Sometimes you just have to do it."

A stoned Cohen jokes about being "bombed in Jerusalem" and after chain smoking cigarettes and shaving, he goes back on stage to deliver an amazing encore that included Famous Blue Raincoat.

After the encore, his fans call him back onstage. Emotionally, he comes out and tells his audience he is too broken down to sing anymore. Backstage, tears dripping down his face, he says, "I've never seen anything like that."

One small bit in this movie was hard to watch. During his performance of the song Story of Isaac, the filmmaker threw in needless, graphic footage of people burning from napalm fire in Vietnam. Keep your finger on the fast-forward button for that. I also felt that bonus footage, especially a commentary track putting the tour in context of the time and place, would have been appreciated.

Otherwise, Bird on a Wire, out this week, is a must-have for Cohen fans. Songs on the DVD, shot at various cities across Europe, include Suzanne, Sisters of Mercy, Chelsea Hotel and So Long, Marianne.

Alan Furst is a master of thrilling spy novels

By JEREMY DAUBER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Alan Furst

Tradecraft. According to the Oxford English Dictionary, the relevant definition of the term is "skill or art in connection with a trade or calling; spec. skill in espionage and intelligence work." As the legions of fans of Alan Furst's spy novels know, Furst is a master of tradecraft in both the general and specific senses. Not only is he an expert in the details and methods of historical espionage – the codings, dead drops and shadowings of yore – but, unlike some of his contemporary counterparts, he is also a remarkable practitioner of the writer's art, wrapping those details and methods in lush, elaborate settings and rich characters.

Notice I didn't mention anything about plot. Not that plot isn't important to Furst's novels, it's just not central. Whatever action the characters take, wherever they direct their attention and blood and sweat, is a very small part of the gigantic operation that lives and breathes all about them, as great powers and armies clash.

And that's something Furst's characters, and his readers, are well aware of. There are no Jack Bauers (the lead character in the TV series 24) or Jason Bournes (a fictional character in the novels of Robert Ludlum and subsequent film adaptations) in a Furst novel, who get the president on the phone and single-handedly stop wars. A mission is completed, or sometimes it isn't; the main characters learn what it was all about afterward – or sometimes they don't. As in real life, or even in the TV show The Wire, the stories are compelling without having to play for ultimate stakes. Process is (almost) all.

Most of Furst's best-known novels, including The Polish Officer (1995) and Night Soldiers (1988), are set in Europe, in the run-up to and during World War II, which helps the general reader, who knows the historical outlines well enough to let Furst suffice with filling in the details, understand the broader context.

His most recent novel, Spies of the Balkans (Random House), though, is set in a less well-known part of the story: the Mediterranean theatre, in the period leading up to the German invasion of Greece in 1941. Furst does a wonderful job of giving us the necessary background and sketching the atmosphere of Salonika, that remarkable crossroads of a city, as the rumours fly and the preparations for war ratchet up.

Those in the know are getting out of town, or hoarding ammunition, or burning files, or laying plots and counterplans. If wars are won and lost before a shot is fired, then Furst gives us an indelible portrait of what the pre-battlefield looks like.

Our tour guide in Spies of the Balkans is a senior police official, Constantine Zannis, whose years of experience handling the most delicate of political cases for the Salonika municipality make him perfectly equipped to read the writing on the wall.

As the novel gets under way, he becomes increasingly embroiled in the secret machinations overwhelming the region: the creation of a private rescue line for endangered Jews in Germany, which leads to an operation for the British government, which leads to larger doings in Yugoslavia. All, in their own way, small parts of very big things. But small, covert actions are just as dangerous as big, explosive ones, and the other side is famously known for its attention to detail.

Each small mission, each story within the story, is can't-wait-to-turn-the-page suspenseful, even if these episodes work better as a constellation of images than as a full-fledged plot. Zannis shadows a German arrival who may, or may not, turn out to be a Nazi spy in his city. Zannis teaches tradecraft to a Jewish woman married to a German officer to help her save Jewish children.

Zannis shakes down small-fry criminals for their invaluable connections in other countries. An unexpected British spy tells Zannis how bureaucratic ineptitude means a valued British resource is at risk and in play. Zannis attempts to disguise himself and the amateur foisted upon him so the SS officer seated next to him in a Paris nightclub won't twig to his mission. And there are others.

True, some of the personal touches – Zannis' relationships with various women and an ongoing encomium to his dog – fall a little flat by comparison, but that's why such books are called "thrillers" and not "novels of psychological exploration."

Spies of the Balkans isn't Furst's best novel. It's not on the same scale or of the quality as Dark Star (1991) or The Polish Officer; the writing isn't quite as fully realized, the miniaturist perfection of the wheels within wheels of operations not as deeply excavated. But that's a high bar indeed, and the secret of tradecraft is that its experts have such bred-in-the-bone quality that even their less than best is still quite good indeed. It shouldn't necessarily be your first Furst, but if it is, it won't be your last.

Multi-tasker merges music with math

Michelle Eisen, 26, performs with the kids' band Leading Notes.

By Rita Pollakov
Staff Reporter

Michelle Eisen doesn't need a calculator to teach math. She needs a flute.

Eisen, 26, is one of four University of Toronto students who started Leading Notes, a musical group that performs in schools for kids aged around four to nine.

The band, which was formed last year by Eisen and some of her fellow Institute of Child Study classmates, includes flutes, banjos, guitars, vocals and a puppet.

"I've been involved in music for a long time, but it's hard to stay involved in that when you're in school," said Eisen.

It wasn't long until she met Erica Coutts, Erica Ellis and Alex Morley, who were just as interested in music.

The group is made up of Eisen, who plays the flute, saxophone, guitar and sings; Ellis, who plays guitar and does vocals; Morley, who plays the banjo, concertina, guitar and sings vocals, and Coutts, the puppeteer who plays percussion, guitar and sings.

So far, Leading Notes has played to some 1,000 children in the Toronto area since January 2010. Their songs are about exploring different instruments and teaching math and literacy.

"Right now we have a song that teaches about the time tables, a song about telling the time and about water capacity," Eisen said. "That was definitely a challenge, that song, but the kids are singing it. You see them singing the songs and doing the actions. They're like, 'Yeah, I got it.'"

Eisen, who is thinking of getting into medicine after completing her master's degree and teaching certificate at U of T, has always been drawn to music.

"This is where my Jewish roots kind of come in," she said, explaining that her parents were into Jewish choral music and sang in Beth Tzedec Congregation's choir. "There was always music in my house, but most of it was Jewish music," she said, adding that she sang in a choir at Hebrew school.

"Singing kind of happened for me as soon as I could make a noise. The piano as well, I think they probably went hand in hand," she said. "I feel like the piano's an extension of what I can hear in my head."

In Grade 7, Eisen picked up the flute. In Grade 9, she picked up the baritone saxophone and last year she started playing the guitar.

"Once there's an instrument available, I want to be playing it," she said, adding that she also writes her own songs.

"[Music] is exciting. It's like when you catch a fish. You get this kind of rush."

But keeping music in her life has taken a lot of creativity. Especially since she likes to multi-task. Along with playing in the Leading Notes, Eisen is also completing illustrations for two children's books she's recently written, which feature insect children and teach life and coping skills. Eisen hopes to publish her first book by December.

"My career path has been a little funny. I have a lot of different interests. I would love to go into music even still, but I've always loved to teach and what I want to do is go into medicine."

Leading Notes, a band that teaches subjects like math through music, has performed at schools and a hospital. From left are Erica Ellis, Michelle Eisen, Erica Coutts and Alex Morley.

With Leading Notes, Eisen can combine teaching with music. And every once in a while, she'll add a little math.

"Putting something into musical form automatically makes it fun," she said.

"I love math. It's that problem-solving aspect to it. I want people to love math, because every year kids get older, they tend to like it less and less until they're in Grade 7 or 8 and feel totally lost."

Eisen finds it easier to teach using song.

"In terms of teaching things like time, that can be really confusing when you're first teaching a child a quarter past two. But this song, everyone got perfect on that part of the test," she said. "[Songs are] a way for them to actually connect to the math."

While Eisen would like to continue Leading Notes after she graduates, she's also started writing music for an older crowd.

"It's been growing. I do compose music for people my own age, but that's more of a newer thing. It was more classical pieces, things that would never really leave my house, but this summer, I've had some time to be inspired," she said, adding that she's switched to jazz and may start performing outside of Leading Notes this year.

Until then, the group should be playing two shows at Indigo bookstore locations sometime soon and would like to release a CD by March.

"I just think music is such a great thing that can be pushed to the wayside often," Eisen said. "It's a great release for stress, a great way to express yourself. It's enjoyable, and often kids aren't exposed to it, especially if they're not growing up in a musical household."

This is where Leading Notes comes in.

"It's taking [kids] outside their box and opening them up to new possibilities for themselves. Even being aware of what's the difference in the way a flute works versus an accordion," she said.

If Eisen does go into medicine, she'll continue to keep teaching and making music, she said.

"I don't see music going out of my life anytime soon."

Twins' slugger turning into a real fan favourite

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The unrelenting search for that relatively rare bird, the Jewish pro athlete, has turned up another candidate.

On June 3, the Minnesota Twins called up third baseman Danny Valencia, adding to the list of Jewish major leaguers.

Since the call-up, Valencia has become a fan favourite. In 216 at-bats, the newcomer from Boca Raton, Fla., hit .343 along with 16 doubles. He has also whacked a grand slam homer off American League Cy Young winner Zach Greinke of the Kansas City Royals to record his first big league round tripper and added 26 RBI and has an on-base-percentage of .382.

The son of Michael and Mindy last year had 218 at-bats in AA New Britain and 269 in AAA Rochester, totalling 38 doubles 14 homers and 70 RBIs. According to Twins' manager Ron Gardenhire, who was impressed with the infielder at 2009 spring training, when, as a non-roster invitee, he batted .429 prior to being returned to AA, Valencia can hit both the fastball and the breaking ball.

In late July, the 6-2, 210-pound 25-year-old also had back-to-back games with four hits apiece, a first for any Twins' rookie.

Being a standout at the great American pastime isn't foreign to Valencia. He was an all-star in the Appalachian, Midwest, and Florida State Leagues, and as a youngster, he dreamt about being a major leaguer.

In 1996, he pitched for the Boca Raton Babe Ruth League 12-and-under all-star baseball team that captured the Florida state championship. Just a year after that, he both pitched and hit for the Boca Lightning travel-baseball team that won 27 games and lost only two and won the South Florida All-Star Travel League title.

Valencia continued to develop. He played shortstop for four years in high school and was voted all-county as a junior in 2002 and offensive player of the year after boasting a .430 average. As a senior in 2003, he batted an almost unheard of .575.

Interestingly, during his sophomore year, Valencia played first base for the University of Miami Hurricanes alongside then-third-baseman Ryan Braun, a fellow Jew. Braun now patrols left field for the Milwaukee Brewers. Valencia hit .300 that year, drove in 63 runs and was named to the all-regional team.

In 2005, after Braun was drafted high in the first round and turned pro, Valencia replaced him at third base in his junior college year and hit .324.

It was somewhat surprising that despite his stellar performances at all levels, major league scouting reports weren't particularly laudable, so much so that at the 2006 baseball draft, the sweet-swinging Valencia wasn't plucked until Round 19 of the draft, 576th overall.

POST PATTER:

As Blue Jays fans were anxiously awaiting a major trade as the July 31 trade deadline approached, Canada's only major league team acquired veteran minor league first baseman Mike Jacobs, who was quickly assigned to the Jays' AAA club in Las Vegas. Some ball fans imagined that Jacobs, who was in the Mets' farm system, might well be a member of the tribe.

An incident in the spring of 2006 should dispel that rumour. At the time, Jacobs was having a decent season with the Florida Marlins. In a bid to boost attendance, the team decided to have a promotion called "Jewish Heritage Day." Believing that Jacobs was a Jew, they gave out T-shirts with his name to young fans who attended the game. They forgot, however, to ask Jacobs if he was in fact of Jewish heritage, but he isn't. Apparently Jacobs was very good-natured about the faux pas.

NBA delegation causes stir during Israel visit

JTA

JERUSALEM — Ten past and present National Basketball Association (NBA) players visited Israeli President Shimon Peres at his Jerusalem office recently.

The visit by the hoopsters, under the auspices of the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC), generated much excitement in the halls of the president's residence, with staff members vying to take photos with the players.

"We're here to stand in support of Israel," Allan Houston, a former star with the New York Knicks and now in the team's front office, told Peres.

Omri Casspi of the Sacramento Kings, the first Israeli to play in the NBA, was part of the delegation.

AIPAC brought the players to Israel to educate them about the United States-Israel relationship, since they are influential with the American public, an AIPAC official stated.

Peres was given a basketball autographed by all the players as well as an official game jersey. Peres passed the ball to his aides, who passed it among themselves after the presentation.

Other delegation members included onetime Toronto Raptor Jerome Williams, the "Junkyard Dog"; David Wood, who last played for Milwaukee in 1996-97; Dwight Howard Sr., the father of Orlando Magic all-star Dwight Howard; and Memphis Grizzlies general manager Chris Wallace.

The players held a basketball workshop and training session for teens after the visit, under the auspices of SportsPower International, a non-profit organization that uses current and former NBA players as role models to make a positive impact on international youth. Later that day, the Maccabi Haifa professional basketball team scrimmaged against a team of former NBA all-stars.

My father's legacy

The Senior Side of Life

The call came from my sister, Diti, in Chicago in the early morning. "The hospital called – Daddy's not doing well. I am going over now."

Our father had been admitted the night before after a few days of attempts by Diti and my father's caregiver to treat, in his retirement home, an apparent infection of sorts. Getting some enhanced help was posing a logistical problem. We decided that even though it was not what we had hoped for when we had discussed care, we agreed that he could only get what he needed for perhaps another reprieve in a hospital. From the emergency room assessment, it sounded as if his dehydration and infection could be treated successfully and maybe we would get some more time with him, even though his function and ability to engage had been declining for some while.

I called the hospital myself, suspecting that the "he is not doing well" message meant he had died. Many health-care providers do not give messages of death over the phone, preferring to break the news in person. I called from Vermont, where I was on vacation, and when I introduced myself, the nurse revealed that our father had died, comfortably, without suffering and without any attempts to resuscitation, which had been declined when he was admitted.

His era was over. As I drove home to Toronto, I reflected on my father's legacy to all who came into contact with him, and especially to me and my sister. Many who sent condolence messages to me said that even though they had never met Max in person, through my writings about him in this CJN forum and my other writings, they felt that they knew him.

Remembering our parents and their values is important to all of us – it is an essential part of our lives and often gives sustenance when we are facing difficult quandaries and decisions or when we want to emphasize a point. My father had that kind of influence on my life through his magnanimous nature, continuous desire and willingness to help anyone in need, and very strong sense of social justice.

When I was thinking of a few stories to tell about him at the small memorial service that my sister and I were arranging at her synagogue, I recalled how every Saturday morning he would take Diti and me to the local public library, where he would read international newspapers and we would find books to take home. It became a ritual that I undertook with my own children, and it sowed the seed for my love of books and writing.

As we left the library, he would always say, much to our childhood irritation, the same thing – "the library is the greatest invention of mankind" to which we would ask, "Why, Daddy?" to which he would answer, "Because within its walls, it has all the knowledge of mankind."

My father taught us to figure out how to fix things (he was an engineer), how to be curious and how to analyze and solve problems. When my junior high school math teacher was on sick leave and we were given a geography teacher as a replacement for six months, my father taught me algebra, as the teacher was out of her depth in that one.

Mostly, my father taught me the value of the human condition and how important it was to be a mensch, of which he was the personification. I will miss him dearly, but his legacy will endure in my life and that of my children and grandchildren.

Say yes to soup

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

As the weather cools down, we start to think of warming up with a bowl of soup – and there are many reasons to indulge.

I have written before about the fact that it takes our metabolism about 20 minutes to shut off. This means that when you feel hungry and then eat your dinner – or the first helping anyway – usually in five to seven minutes, your brain is still firing the hunger cues for another 10 to 15, causing you to continue eating even though your stomach is full.

This can lead to significant overeating. So, how do we prevent it? One way is to make a conscious effort to put one appropriate helping on your plate, eat more slowly and then wait for 20 to 30 minutes before deciding to eat more.

Another great way to slow things down is with soup. Soup is effective because it's hot and takes a long time to eat. It's also primarily a liquid, which is filling. This may be just the thing to stretch out your dinnertime and let you spend at least 20 minutes eating.

Think, too, of all the conversation potential in those 20 minutes. Dinnertime should be family time whenever possible.

So, what kind of soup? Are all soups OK? Not really. If you are watching your weight, then steer clear of soups full of carbs like barley, pasta and potato, and avoid cream soups. Choose vegetable varieties (mushroom, tomato, cauliflower, broccoli, squash, carrot, zucchini, onion and mixed vegetable soups). Minestrone is also a good choice, as is chicken soup loaded with chunky carrots, celery and onions instead of noodles, kreplach and matzah balls.

Soup is also a great way to get some vitamins and fibre from vegetables or by tossing in a few legumes such as beans. It's also a fabulous way to use up leftover vegetables. And most kids like soup.

Don't have time to make your own soup? No problem. There are plenty of great soups to buy. Some of the fresh jarred varieties are fantastic as are some canned ones. Just read the label carefully and watch the salt content. Enjoy!

Returning to Israel: a phobic point of view, Part 2

URBAN WRITER

I present you with Part 2 of my return to Israel as an agoraphobic – someone afraid of open spaces. This article is in honour of you who experience anxiety and wish you could be there in Israel, too, but haven't found the strength. And I present this to you who have made the journey. Well done. Shanah Tovah. Peace in Israel and the world.

We climbed into a van that would take us to Jerusalem. We waited in the hot Tel Aviv sun to depart the airport. It was clear Israeli scheduling hadn't changed dramatically since 1994.

And then it happened.

A father of a paraplegic woman and the driver of our van twisted and turned, trying desperately to get the embarrassed woman into the vehicle. Her shirt had crept up in the back. She pulled it down. Finally, they managed to seat her as we, the foreign travellers, smoothed out our creases of discomfort.

I was in Israel and I remembered what I had missed. It was the camaraderie. It was all coming back to me – that despite Israel's thorny disunity, there is an aspect of the people that exudes warmth and an organic sense of unity. This stems from the fact that the predominant character trait in the Middle East is hospitality. It also emanates, I'm sure, from the reality that Israelis are surrounded by millions of enemies. It makes sense to stick together.

The driver did not demand anything from the father. The father simply offered up a calm thank you. The three of them – father, driver and daughter – were passengers in a moment where all concerned understood their roles, and like a mother coddling a sick child through the night, lived up to what was expected of them with a quiet graciousness, a Jewish generosity.

I was in Israel and would be there for the next week. That night, I visited the Kotel with my colleague and was encouraged by some of the Wall professionals to join a minyan, give tzedakah, become religious and join a yeshiva. I was annoyed and elated. When else in my life would I interact with such piquant people who believed it was entirely acceptable, in fact imperative, to stand in judgment of others and virtually insist they change their lives?

I was in Israel, and few people I passed on the street wished me Shabbat Shalom. And why should they? Everyone in my sphere was a Jew and such salutations would be far too demanding and time consuming. Would I wish "Happy Canada Day" to everyone I met back home?

I was in Israel and aghast that Israelis are friendlier and far less nervous than ever. I wasn't sure if that augurs well for national security, but it did make for a more pleasant time. The driver who took me to my father's gravesite was calm and communicative. The poor man had lost his brother two weeks before. We talked about it. We mourned together. (He refused to use a GPS. We passed the cemetery a dozen times. It was OK, though, because I was back home.)

On returning to Toronto, I felt courageous at having travelled 6,000 miles, to Israel and then flying another 6,000 miles home. While my week was not anxiety-free, and I have no immediate plans to return to Israel, I did it. Phobics will understand my victory.

I hadn't been in Israel since 1994 and I truly believed I would never return. On June 25, however, I passed through the gates of Jerusalem and I was home again.

Be brave. Take some meds. Israel awaits.

Russia sticks with missile sale to Syria

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu admitted on Sunday that despite intensive diplomacy, Israel has failed to dissuade Russia from selling advanced missiles to Syria.

Speaking at Sunday's weekly cabinet meeting, Netanyahu said Russia's plan to go ahead with the delivery of P-800 anti-ship missiles to Syria is problematic for Israel.

"We have been aware of this deal for some time, and there were discussions with the Russians at every level," Netanyahu said.

Syria signed a deal to buy the P-800 Yakhont supersonic cruise missiles from Russia in 2007. Israel says the weapons pose significant danger to its naval vessels in the Mediterranean and could upset the strategic balance in the region.

"To our regret, the deal is now proceeding in stages, and that is problematic for us," Netanyahu said, adding that the Syrian missiles were part of the reason for Israel's recent decision to upgrade its air force with new American F-35 warplanes.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu

"We are dealing with a new arsenal of missiles and rockets, and there has to be a military response to that," he said.

On Friday, Russian Defence Minister Anatoly Serdyukov announced that Russia would go ahead with its sale of advanced anti-ship missiles to Syria, despite recent attempts by U.S. and Israeli officials to thwart the planned deal.

The Israeli defence establishment is greatly concerned about Russia's plans to go ahead with a sale of advanced arms to Syria, a defence source said Saturday.

"Israel views [arms sale] with great concern," the senior defence official said. "The weapons will eventually be turned against Israel."

The arms deal, signed in 2007, involves the sale of advanced P-800 Yakhont supersonic cruise missiles to the Syrian military, weaponry Israel considers capable of posing significant danger to its navy vessels in the Mediterranean Sea.

New Academic Award

CALGARY — The Calgary Jewish Community Council has created a new award to fund students and faculty at Mount Royal University who are researching the Holocaust and human rights. The $1,800 award, to be handed out annually to pay for research expenses, was created with an $18,000 donation in recognition of the school's Holocaust Education Program, a 26-year-old initiative that now hosts some 2,700 high school students annually.

Greenspon Joins Star

TORONTO — Edward Greenspon, former editor-in-chief of the Globe and Mail, started a new job last week as vice-president of business development at the Toronto Star and the Star Media Group. Greenspon was editor of the Globe from 2002 until his firing in 2009. In addition to his newly created executive position, he'll write a weekly column, the paper said.

Drive Seeks $1.15M

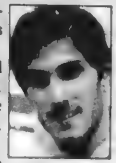
HAMILTON — Hamilton's 75th annual UJA campaign is aiming to raise $1.15 million, its campaign chairs announced earlier this month. The goal for the 2011 drive represents an increase of $80,000, or 7.5 per cent, over last year's total of $1.07 million and would bring the campaign back to the high it reached in 2008, before the effects of the recession began to be felt, the Hamilton Jewish News reported.

World

Deputy Sues Sheriff

LOS ANGELES — The Jewish sheriff's deputy who arrested actor Mel Gibson for drunken driving is suing his department for harassment he says he's endured since the July 2006 incident. Because he reported the requests of superiors to remove Gibson's anti-Semitic tirade from the initial arrest report, the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department has passed him over for deserved promotions and retaliated in other ways, James Mee charged in his suit. Mee said the request by his superiors stemmed from Gibson's celebrity status and friendship with Sheriff Lee Baca. Mee agreed to the separate report, but he was accused of leaking it to a Hollywood website.

Billboard Featuring Israeli NBAer Defaced



Omri Casspi

SACRAMENTO — A billboard featuring Israeli-born NBAer Omri Casspi was defaced with a swastika a second time.

The billboard was discovered vandalized on Sept. 16, the second time in about a week. It was painted over before most people were able to see it. The first attack took place Sept. 8, Erev Rosh Hashanah.

Casspi, a forward for the Sacramento Kings, is the first Israeli basketball player in the NBA. He called the first incident "hurtful" in an interview with the Sacramento Bee.

The Anti-Defamation League announced a $1,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of whoever painted the swastika. Kings co-owner Joe Maloof said the team would match the ADL's reward.

Both acts of vandalism are being investigated as possible hate crimes, but police said they have no leads.

Union Backs Boycott

LONDON — Britain's national trade union again voted unanimously last week to support a boycott of goods made in West Bank settlements and of firms profiting from the area. Delegates to the Trade Unions Congress also condemned the Histadrut, Israel's national trade union, for backing the Gaza blockade and Israel's action to stop the aid flotilla in May. It reiterated its support for the Palestine Solidarity Campaign and Palestinian trade unions. In practice, the resolution, which is similar to one adopted last year, doesn't have much effect beyond rhetoric. Protests outside supermarkets that sell products from the settlements hardly materialized.

Banker Resigns

BERLIN — A German official resigned from the country's central bank board over remarks about Jews and Muslims widely condemned as racist. Thilo Sarrazin asked German President Christian Wulff on Sept. 10 to allow him to resign. The Bundesbank's board had already asked Wulff to fire Sarrazin, who threatened to fight the decision. In his new book Germany Abolishes Itself, and in public comments surrounding its release, Sarrazin has blamed Muslim immigrants for what he considers a decline in German culture. He's also said Jews and others possess superior genes.

MK fights 'war of ideas' for Israel

By MICHELLE BITRAN
Special to The CJN

Israel is facing an entirely new kind of war, a war of ideas, member of Knesset Einat Wilf told a rapt audience of Jewish young adults at The House, a Jewish social meeting place in Toronto last week.

Wilf, 39, sits in the Knesset on behalf of Israel's centre-left Labor party and she serves on the Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee. She arrived in Toronto last week during the Knesset's annual break to begin a month-long series of speaking engagements that will take her throughout Canada and the United States.

"The war has mutated again into another arena," Wilf said, "and this time, it's the arena of ideas and images." She explained that since 1948, Israel has been in a constant state of war. First, it was traditional military war, followed by terrorism and then economic warfare, including the boycott of Israeli products.

The war of ideas, Wilf said, is the latest arena of warfare, wherein Israel's enemies seek to undermine the basic Zionist idea of Israel's right to exist as a homeland for the Jewish people. "Israel is a small country, and it cannot survive for long in a world that doesn't believe it has the right to exist," she said.

According to Wilf, the war of ideas is fought primarily in the media and on university campuses. It is for this reason, she explained, that young Jewish people around the world are on the front lines.

Wilf worries about the growing trend of Jewish youths distancing themselves from Israel because of the controversy that surrounds it. "Many people have responded with the idea that if Israel is not perfect, then [they] want nothing to do with it," she said.

"I've noticed a very disturbing trend. This generation has found that Israel is not that perfect creation on which they have been reared. It's a grey, complex reality. Many people have resorted to intellectual laziness and decided to distance themselves from Israel," she said.

She emphasized the importance of engaging in the moral dilemmas that face Israel instead of running away from them and disassociating from Israel altogether. "Being moral in conditions where you do not have to face moral dilemmas is not much of an achievement," she said, explaining how Jewish morality is unique in how it is taught in the context of dealing with real-life issues, as opposed to avoiding them.

Einat Wilf

When asked about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and its perception in the West, Wilf was quick to point out that the Palestinians maintain a culture of resistance against Zionism instead of building a culture of construction and self-determination. "Resisting may be heroic," she said, "but it's also kind of infantile."

Wilf, who has studied extensively in Europe and the United States, added that, thus far, the West has been sympathetic to the Palestinians, but she believes this contradicts traditional western values of taking responsibility for oneself and of being proactive. She explained that a nation, like a person, grows up only when she or he stops "assigning blame to everyone around."

Audience member Maya Strasser, 23, came to Wilf's talk after spending a year living in Israel. "I thought it was interesting because she repeated a lot of things that kind of mirrored my own opinions about Israel," she said.

Hope versus reality

From the editor's desk...

September is a busy, eventful sometimes calming, sometimes vexing month. It brings us the annual High Holidays of Tishrei. Not to be forgotten, it also brings us the high-level meetings of the General Assembly of the United Nations. ("High-level meeting" is a direct quotation from the public documents of the United Nations itself.)

The 65th session of the United Nations opened last week on Sept. 14. At the opening session, the president of the 65th session, Joseph Deiss, former minister for foreign affairs of Switzerland, delivered a stirring plea to member-delegates. His words attest to both the lofty ideals that were the driving inspiration for the creation of the UN and the grotesque Salvador Dalian surrealism that mostly characterizes the organization today.

"I hope that this session will meet the great expectations placed in us. We have an obligation to deliver results. The issues to be discussed are too serious for that obligation not to be our primary motivation, which pushes us to move beyond our purely national interests and truly work for the benefit of all," Deiss told the delegates at the opening session.

Deiss focused upon three broad areas: (a) ensuring the attainment of the Millennium Development Goals of significantly reducing poverty, hunger, disease, maternal and child deaths and other ills by 2015; (b) invigorating the role of the UN and the General Assembly in global governance; and (c) promoting sustainable development.

I have highlighted the words that illustrate the hard-cast dichotomy between what the UN was intended to be and what it actually is today.

The original founders of the UN, admittedly most of whom carried a western vision of governance, democracy and human rights, envisioned a world in the horrible wake of World War II, in which individual national sovereignties would not always trump the broader, global, collective good.

None of us seriously opposes the objectives Deiss articulated. But who among us in the affluent, democratic West and especially among the supporters of the State of Israel any longer holds "high expectations" of the UN?

Who among us carries the slightest scintilla of even scant hope that the members of the UN could ever "move beyond our purely national interests and truly work for the benefit of all?"

Two structural tensions within the very idea of a "United Nations" create the dichotomy between hope and reality.

The inherent paradox between inviolate, national sovereignty and its subordination for the sake of the collective is the first structural tension. As we know, as we see even from the policies of our own government, rightly and wrongly, nation-states do not easily surrender control over decision-making aspects of their sovereign independence when they believe it is not in the national self-interest.

The second tension stems from the propensity among the 192 member states in the UN to aggregate in a number of self-defining, self-reinforcing blocs. When it comes to voting in the various bodies of the United Nations, there is indeed strength in numbers. Israel has been the ever-constant victim of such bloc-voting.

Thus, for example the Organization of the Islamic Conference can quickly summon 56 votes, the Arab League 22 and the organization of the (self-styled, so-called) Non-Aligned Movement of states a possible 118 votes.

Of course, there are many other blocs of member-states, operating inside and outside the UN, some of whose principles we might support and whose alignments we might cheer. But they tend to be smaller in membership and voting heft than the blocs we do not cheer.

Starting this week, we will see the annual parade of international dignitaries making their way to the rostrum of the General Assembly.

What they say in front of the rolling cameras is occasionally – perhaps even often – not as important as what they might say privately in camera in the company of other world leaders without the clicks of shutters and audio tapes affronting their senses.

But not always.

For example, it is hard to imagine Iranian Prime Minister Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who is slated to address the General Assembly, saying something privately that will be at odds with what he has been saying publicly, ad nauseum. Indeed the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations has urged UN delegates to walk out on the Iranian leader as soon as he tries to ascend the rostrum.

Whatever the reaction that accompanies the Iranian leader's visit to the UN, the very fact that he represents all that the UN was intended to oppose, proves the wide, sad disparity between the original hope and the disheartening reality.

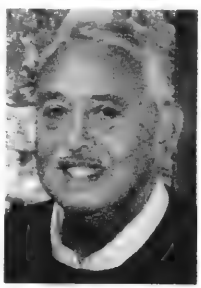
Conservative shuls beef up high school program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto-area Conservative shuls are expanding the educational options they offer to high school students.

For the past dozen years, Adath Israel Congregation has offered a supplementary Jewish studies program for teens.

But this fall, its principal, Cantor Eli Kirshblum, has enlisted clergy from seven local synagogues to serve as faculty for the program and a new sister location at Beth Tzedec Congregation. At one time, Beth Tzedec had the largest such program among Conservative shuls, but it hasn't offered one for a number of years.



Cantor Eli Kirshblum

Kirshblum, Adath Israel's cantor emeritus, is the educational director of the reconfigured, two-branch school, which will be known as Congregational High School.

The school, which launches Oct. 4 with a combined barbecue and orientation, is under the aegis of the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues (CCCS). CCCS and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto are funding the program, and the tuition of $395 includes course materials and supper.

There's no Jewish education prerequisite, although some students in the past have had a day school background, Kirshblum said. Others have attended supplementary school or have not had a formal Jewish education, he added.

The CCCS was formed in 2008 shortly after Adath Israel, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and Beth Tzedec left the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the umbrella body for Conservative congregations in North America. Beth Sholom Synagogue, which was previously unaffiliated, has been part of the CCCS since its inception.

Of the other congregations that are involved with the school, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation and Beth Tikvah Synagogue remain affiliated with the United Synagogue and have not joined the CCCS. Beth Torah Congregation, previously unaffiliated, is also a CCCS member.

Kirshblum, who chairs the CCCS' education committee, said that Beth Tzedec, now the south branch of the Congregational High School, will serve Beth Sholom and Beth Torah, as well as its own congregation, while Adath Israel, the central branch, will also serve Beth David, Beth Emeth and Beth Tikvah.

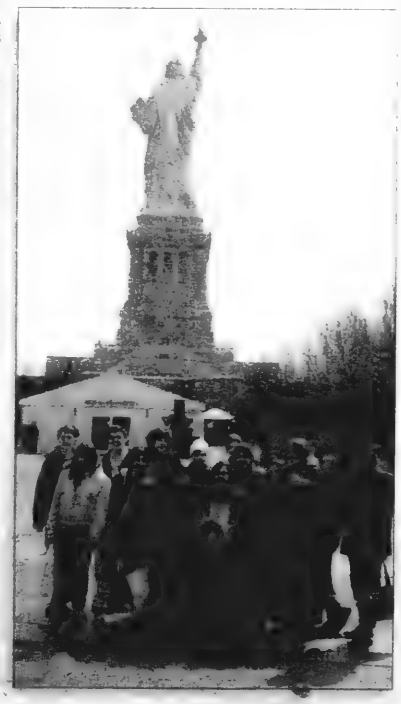
Non-members are also welcome at the school, Kirshblum added.

Classes will run on Mondays from 5 p.m. to 7 p.m., with an optional third hour if students want to take Hebrew for a high school credit.

Core classes will focus on contemporary issues such as biomedical ethics, Israel, God and faith, parent-child relationships, and current events "We can deal with topics they never have, as well as dealing with their world from a Jewish perspective," Kirshblum said.

There is no homework, and no marks are given out. Students who have attended at least 75 per cent of classes for the first two years receive a $1,500 grant toward an Israel program (or $2,000 after three years with the same attendance record).

Kirshblum said the school aims to challenge its students and "make their Judaism come alive for them, so they can get a sense of what the Jewish approach is on certain important topics."



High school students visited the Statue of Liberty on a March break trip to New York in 2008.

Moscow mischief may prove deadly

Last Friday, Russian Defence Minister Anatoly Serdyukov announced to the world that Russia is indeed proceeding to complete the sale of advanced P-800 Yakhont supersonic cruise missiles to Syria. Frequent, multi-level Israeli and American efforts to convince the Russians to cancel or postpone the agreement have failed.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu acknowledged the failure on Sunday when he advised his cabinet, "To our regret, the deal is now proceeding in stages and that is problematic for us. We are dealing with a new arsenal of missiles and rockets and there has to be a military response to that."

Israel and the United States are deeply troubled by the sale of the missiles to the Syrians.The weapons are intended to target Israeli and possibly American naval vessels in the Mediterranean. More ominously, however, as it has done in the past, Syria will likely transfer the missiles to Hezbollah. "The weapons will eventually be turned against Israel," a senior Israeli official warned on Sunday.

These very worrisome security concerns have been emphatically conveyed to the Russian defence establishment. Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak met with Russia's decision-makers earlier this month. In fact, during Barak's visit to the Kremlin, the two countries signed a military co-operation agreement. Ironically, in announcing that bilateral agreement, Serdyukov said "It's very important to us that in the transition to a new image [our emphasis], the Russian armed forces use the experience the Israeli armed forces have and the work they have done." Russia covets Israeli defence technology, especially that of the unmanned airplanes. Moscow has already bought 12 of the drones and is training its personnel to operate them.

Even Israeli President Shimon Peres' direct importunings of Kremlin leaders have fallen on deaf ears.

There may no longer be an Iron Curtain encircling Russia, but peering into Russia's geo-strategic, geo-political domain and seeing clearly the outlines of the emerging country is still a fool's game. To which "new image" would the Russian defence minister have us believe his country is transitioning? Russia trades with the West, is part of the influential "G" groupings with the West, wishes to look like the West, uses the most advanced consumer gadgets of the West, but still contends with the West with the same old-time Cold War mischief in its heart. It must be more than nostalgia that drives Russian Prime Minister Vladmir Putin.

Putin's decision to deliver the cruise missiles to Syria harken back to the worst days of the Cold War. He has placed Israeli lives directly at risk. Moreover, he has potentially impaired Israel's ability to defend its borders and its citizens. The consequences for the Jewish state may prove quite deadly.

Israel and the West must not place any trust in Russia. The new Russia may still be the old Russia. It simply cannot be trusted.

25 years ago in The CJN

Inflation in Israel rose by 3.9 per cent in August 1985. The figure was nearly double what had been hoped for in the first month of a new austerity program, but it was one of the lowest increases in recent years. Since the beginning of 1985, inflation in Israel had amounted to 160 per cent.

CUPW president's views a disappointment

As distasteful as I find the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement and its recent foolish attempts to challenge the blockade, I'm of the belief that it may be possible to have productive discussion with its proponents. How disappointing it was to read the answers given by Denis Lemelin, the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Works, in response to the questions asked by your reporter in "CUPW calls for end to Gaza blockade" (Sept. 2). Lemelin's answers show not only a lack of knowledge in regards to the circumstances surrounding the blockade, but also a pitiful lack of intellectual curiosity in regards to the subject. Lemelin responds, "That's what you say," when asked about the Hamas charter's reference to the destruction of Israel and the killing of Jews. Both of the these subjects are discussed openly in the Hamas charter.

Murdered 'settlers' are murdered Jews

Two men and two women, one of whom was pregnant – were murdered in a terrorist drive-by shooting near Kiryat Arba, east of Hebron, on Aug. 31. My husband, Darrell Sherman, went to the funeral in Beit Chaggai. He described the event as the most gut-wrenching scene he has ever witnessed. Six children sat at the feet of their murdered parents. The speeches were difficult, especially those of the families. The morning before the terrorist attack, Darrell said that the time of peace talks is the most dangerous time. I asked him if this is peace talks, what will so-called peace hold in store?

The Jewish world needs to be screaming right now. Is our own blood not worth it? Are we so self-doubting that we can't stand up for ourselves? Parents trying to get home, to get their kids ready for the first day of school, were brutally shot down. Isn't bloody murder enough for us to scream bloody murder?

Are the settlers the only Jews mourning these losses? Aren't Jews in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv and the rest of the world also in shock, distraught and angry? Why do the newspapers keep referring to the murdered "settlers?" Why not murdered "Jews" of our own country, Israel, of which we "settlers" are citizens? An unborn soul was taken. Six children, a wife, a husband and countless others have been affected by this horrible event. Keep Israel and all of its souls in your prayers. And scream, especially any North Americans reading this – scream, defend and scream some more!

Unfair to Canadian government

It is with the greatest respect that I write to chastise Jean Gerber on her description of the Canadian government with regard to the census form issue ("A shameful decision on the census long form," Aug. 19). To refer to our government as "an evil presence" is not fair.

On the same page as Gerber's column is a column by Gerald Gall, describing Jewish life through the years in Shanghai ("The Jewish experience of Shanghai"). He cites the population count of this Jewish community through these years, both past and present. One must suspect that there were no census forms involved, long or short.

I am confident that our ably staffed and capable community organizations will be able to do their good work under the new circumstances. As before, not only will they be able to determine that poverty exists in our communities, but more importantly, who the impoverished are and how to help them.

To attach nefarious motives to our present government, one that leads the way in its support of Israel and the fight against anti-Semitism, is not warranted.

The existence of God

Rabbi Bernard Baskin's column on "The God I believe in" (July 8) is well written and straight from the heart, but, unfortunately, it misses the point. What he is really advocating is the spirituality that one experiences in daily life, for example, in visiting aged, suffering parents, in devoting time to fellow human beings, in feeling love and in the search for justice.

Rabbi Baskin, however, fails to recognize that by assuming the Judeo-Christian notion of the existence of God, one also assumes God's omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence. Now, the attribution of those qualities to God leads to an endless debate about free will and God's lack of intervention in human affairs, even despite fervent prayers.

Rabbi Baskin must also recognize that innumerable other peoples of the world do not necessarily share his view of God. One can certainly feel very spiritual watching a sunrise, but this hardly leads to the proof of the existence of any form of God.

What does it mean to be a sustainable Jew?

By FRED WINEGUST

Have you ever thought of Sukkot as a holiday that celebrates the sustainable Jew?

In ancient Israel, Sukkot had a major agricultural focus. The celebration was a thanksgiving for the fruit harvest and the blessings of nature in the year that had passed. Today, Sukkot is a Jewish festival for which we step out of the comfort of our own homes and enter temporary dwellings where we are exposed to the vagaries of the weather while performing the mitzvah of leshev basukkah.

As you sit in the sukkah, think about the roof. The schach must be made from some product of the Earth, which is no longer attached to the Earth. Wood of all kinds, including bamboo poles, leafy branches and branches of pine trees, are considered good for schach.

Another aspect of Sukkot is the bringing together of the etrog, lulav, hadassim and aravot. According to the midrash, each of these four represent different mixes of aroma and taste, and in a way represent the different mixes of Torah observance and good deeds of Jewish individuals. When we bring these four items together, they represent a communal whole.

Sukkot is also connected with water. The Talmud teaches that during the festival of Sukkot, HaShem judges the world over its water. On the final day of the holiday, special prayers are offered, imploring on High to provide rain and sufficient water.

All of this ties together harvest, lulav, etrog, hadassim, aravot and water; they are all part of a natural system that takes carbon dioxide out of our air and converts it to oxygen. The plants that we use to supply the sukkah's schach and which make up the lulav/ etrog combination depend on water and are not destroyed in the process, but continue to grow and regenerate year after year.

From year to year, the weather we are in contact with over the Sukkot period changes, depending on the timing of the arrival of the holiday. This small slice of outdoor weather started me thinking about the climate we are living in, and what going into a sukkah would mean in the years to come.

Are we as a people, in the Diaspora or in Israel, taking actions that minimize our impact on the environment and leave this world a better place for our children?

Do we know what is happening to our environment and why? Do we know the actions we can take that can make a difference? Do we know and act? Do we know yet fail to act? Do we act without knowing the reason why? Do we do nothing?

Are we as Jewish individuals, families, communities or as a people doing what we can to influence others to live a more sustainable life through knowledge and actions?

I began to think more about this question after returning from a 10-day family adventure to the American Rockies. For years, I have regaled my family with stories of my late 1980s business trips to Vail and Boulder, Colo. I convinced them of the value of enjoying the fresh mountain air and seeing the snow-capped mountains and glaciers, even in the summer.

When we finally reached the mountains, which are more than 14,000 feet high, my family was struck by the lack of snow and the small size of the few remaining glaciers. I'm sure those of you who have been to the Canadian Rockies in Alberta have seen a similar glacial retreat at the Columbia Icefield.

My youngest son, Zev, wanted to know what happened and where all the snow went. The simple answer to an 11-year-old was, "It melted." The comeback of an 11-year-old, raised on the Discovery Channel and Mythbusters, and his four siblings, who were raised on Bill Nye the Science Guy, was, "Why?"

"It melted" was not going to satisfy them. It took a visit to the National Center for Atmospheric Research (NCAR)in Boulder to put the answer into perspective. The scientists at NCAR are part of a team of 300 scientists, representing 160 research groups in 48 countries who contributed to a report titled State of the Climate in 2009.

This report documented measured decreases in snow cover, sea ice and glaciers, and increases in air temperature, humidity, ocean heat and temperature, sea level and temperature both land and sea. The report also led to the July 29 Globe and Mail headline "Signs of warming Earth are unmistakable" and an Aug. 30 Maclean's magazine cover story called "Extreme weather warning."

When the NCAR tour guide found out that I was recently trained by former U.S. vice-president and environmental activist Al Gore to be a volunteer presenter for the Climate Project, she asked me to explain the issues behind global warming to the 30 people on the tour. An NCAR exhibit on the second floor enabled me to explain the reasons behind the melting glacier

I explained how the sun emits radiation and how most of this radiation is absorbed by the Earth and warms it. Some of the energy is radiated back into space by the Earth in the form of infrared waves and some of this outgoing infrared radiation is trapped by the Earth's atmosphere and warms it. Increased levels of greenhouse gases in the atmosphere end up trapping more infrared radiation, causing a further increase in temperatures.

The answer was more than enough to satisfy the curious, but not enough for my eldest daughter, Tamara. She said, "Cousin Jeff says that all of this is occurring due to natural and not man-made causes."

"What are these greenhouse gases anyway?" added my 17-year-old son, Marc.

No need to answer all of these probing questions right away, as it was time to go see the dinosaur bones at Dinosaur Ridge, west of Denver. Perhaps there was a way for my family to discover that both natural and man-made elements can play a role in global warming and species extinction.

Seeing dinosaur tracks in 60-million-year-old exposed stone took their mind off the problems of melting snow and global warming.

When we reached the Field Museum in Chicago, we saw an evolution exhibit featuring dinosaurs. Part of the exhibit hypothesized that the changes we have seen on Earth over a period of time have been influenced by changes in climate. One of the key displays was about natural cycles of climate change, explained by the Milankovitch cycles. These cycles are made up of natural variations in the relationship between the Earth and the sun; the orbit of the Earth around the sun; the degree of the Earth's tilt; the direction of the Earth's axis of rotation. This phenomenon is part of existing climate science.The observed cyclical temperature increases are not caused by increases in greenhouse gases, but due to natural warming and cooling cycles.

The current theory is that the end of the dinosaurs was caused by climate change resulting from a meteor hitting the Earth. The impact sent so much particulate matter into the atmosphere that the sun was blocked, which preventing the sun's radiation from heating the Earth and led to a dramatic cooling of the Earth. The Milankovitch cycles did not have anything to do with the extinction of the dinosaurs.

The Field Museum exhibit showed that man-made and naturally occurring gases can have a similar climate-changing impact, in the direction of heating the planet. This was my chance to tell my children what greenhouse gases are.

Different human-caused greenhouse-gas pollutants are increasing the amount of infrared radiation being trapped, leading to these temperature increases. There are six families of greenhouse-gas pollutants, which appear in various proportions and are being tracked, inventoried and targeted for reduction.

Electricity generation, industrial and agricultural activities, landfill, heating and cooling, deforestation and transportation are just some sources of greenhouse-gas emissions. These gases include carbon dioxide (CO2), methane, black carbon or soot, halocarbons, carbon monoxide, volatile organic compounds and nitrous oxide.

The measure of CO2 concentration in the atmosphere was below 300 parts per million (PPM) in the 800,000 years prior to the Industrial Revolution, when scientists believe that the Milankovitch cycles operated without the need to accommodate for any human-generated activity.

A CO2 concentration of 350 PPM has been declared the "danger" number. Recent scientific measurements put us at a CO2 concentration of 390 PPM, and the growth in the number is accelerating. With more greenhouse gases in the atmosphere, more infrared radiation is being trapped, leading to more heating. As the PPM number continues to rise, we are seeing the effects of melting ice and the other factors documented in the State of the Climate in 2009.

Various environmental accords setting targets to reduce greenhouse gases to 1990 levels, or to percentages of levels measured in an earlier year, by a certain target date are trying to slow the acceleration of atmospheric CO2 concentration and then, if possible, reverse it to less dangerous levels.

My hope is that by gaining a better understanding of the various sources of greenhouse-gas pollution, we can inspire ourselves to take the first steps in personal, community and business action, and become sustainable Jews.

Can we change energy consumption patterns, alter product supply chains, exploit business opportunities to commercialize scientific discoveries, or find new ways to apply technology to reducing greenhouse-gas emissions?

There is an immediate problem and an urgent need to act. There are steps you can take that will have a positive measurable impact. Using energy-saving light bulbs and implementing home and office retrofits of lighting, heating and air-conditioning systems can measurably decrease energy consumption and allow coal-generated electricity plants to be turned off. These are some of the steps you can take now.

As we enter the period of Sukkot and put ourselves closer to nature by sitting outside under a green canopy in our sukkah, we should start to think about the type of world we are living in today, what we will be leaving to our children and grandchildren tomorrow, and the sustainable actions we will need to take as Jews, as individuals, as a community, as a country and as members of humanity, to ensure that we leave the world in a better state.

Opinions

The threat of piety

Pompous defenders of Jewish rights are quick to label liberal Jewish critics of Israeli government policies as self-hating Jews. Yet they often ignore, at times even celebrate, sinister enemies of Israel who manifest their passion for power in the guise of piety and in the name of Torah.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Particularly pernicious are the haredim who live in Israel but refuse to be of Israel. We owe the highest respect to every genuine Orthodox Jew, but anybody who abuses Judaism in the name of religious fervour deserves our contempt.

Too many haredim in Israel may be of that ilk. Some are said to engage in subversive activities to which secular politicians, fearing a backlash at the polls, turn a blind eye. We in the Diaspora often collude in silence. Our own religious insecurities move us to misguided reverence for fake manifestations of authenticity.

Thus when Rabbi Yitzchak Shapira and a co-author recently published a book giving ostensibly halachic endorsement to the killing of gentiles, even non-Jewish children, he and his coterie got enthusiastic support from admirers as they refused to submit to a police investigation by claiming disdain for the law of the state.

Mercifully, many thoughtful Israelis do react against such antics. Columnists, not only in the liberal Ha'aretz, have expressed alarm at the trend to "Talibanize" Israel.

Writing in the Jerusalem Post last month, Daniel Gordis of Jerusalem's right-leaning Shalem Centre wrote about Israel's collective shame when men like Rabbi Shapira and his many supporters are able to get away with it.

Similarly, the mass circulation Yediot Achronot has reported that many haredi schools insidiously subvert the Israeli educational system. They take money from the state for undertaking to teach secular subjects which they then ignore. That's allegedly one reason why only nine per cent of haredi Israelis hold high school diplomas; 65 per cent are unskilled and unemployed and often live on the welfare of the state they despise.

The paper quoted the economist Dan Ben-David, who said that without basic education among the rapidly growing haredi population with its high birthrate, "Israel will not be able to exist in two decades."

If observers like Ben-David, Gordis and many others are right, the erosion of Israeli society by sinister powers in the name of piety constitutes an infinitely greater danger than leftist academics who, unlike most haredim, serve in the Israel Defence Forces and pay their taxes, but express critical views about specific policies.

Piety can be a lethal weapon in the quest for power as it threatens the Jewish state by abusing the freedoms of Israeli democracy.

The many messages of Sukkot

Here we are in the midst of Tishrei, soon to welcome in the nine-day festival of Sukkot, Shmini Atzeret, and Simchat Torah. Strange as it is, soon after our new year of 5771 is celebrated, we gather again under the full moon of the Hebrew lunar month to celebrate the last of the three pilgrimage festivals in the cycle of Pesach, Shavuot and Sukkot. But why is it the last holiday if the new year has just begun?

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

The Jewish calendar has four different days of new year, and the holiday cycle begins in the northern hemisphere spring with Nisan, while a date in autumn marks the counting of years from Creation, as it were. This isn't too complex for folks who are used to a calendar year starting Jan. 1, a school year starting the day after Labour Day, and various fiscal years starting whenever some corporate structure decides.

But what is it about Sukkot that makes it a fitting holiday for our autumn and that of the Land of Israel? In Israel, the final harvests are in, and Sukkot is usually seen as a celebration of a good harvest. But do the symbols and rituals of Sukkot point only in that direction?

Take first the four species of lulav (date palm), etrog (citron), hadas (myrtle), and aravah (willow). The tradition teaches us that each of these species represents a different admixture of qualities, where taste symbolizes knowledge of Torah and aroma symbolizes good deeds or mitzvot.

The etrog has both good taste and a fine aroma. The fruit of the lulav, the date, has taste but no aroma. The hadas has aroma but no taste. And the sad willow has neither. Bringing them all together in their combined beauty is a profound prescription for Jewish unity – one might even say proactive pluralism. But it's also an admission of human frailty and imperfection. Individually, very few of us can boast of etrog perfection, and those who do are certainly not etrogim. Holding on to each other and respecting even the role and place of the willow, we can aspire to a fullness that none of us can achieve alone.

The sukkah as a symbol is as complex at least. First, its form as a word and its actual being as a structure are one and the same. It must be the only piece of human architecture whose name is also its blueprint. Its first letter, samech, has four walls. Its second letter, kaf, has three. It ends with a hey that is built of two-and-a-half walls. Three optional plans for a kosher sukkah! It's meant to house us for all the days of the festival, but it's flimsy, non-permanent and its roof leaks. Yes, we have made our sukkot beautiful in the various countries we've lived in for the past 2,000 years, but the original plans were for a structure that reminds us more of the instability and danger of nature rather than its beauty and bounty. It's in the sukkah that we wonder how to be thankful even in a year of poor harvests, especially on a holiday that stresses the joy of celebration (see Deuteronomy 16: 14-15).

I think the secret of the sukkah is to be found in a book that we read just before Sukkot on Yom Kippur afternoon, Jonah. In the enigmatic Chapter 4, Jonah builds a sukkah to shade himself from the sun. In the very next verse, God creates some vegetation to shade Jonah, but this time to save Jonah from his own evil. (The words for shade and save sound similar in Hebrew and may even come from related roots.) Does the sukkah, then, offer some physical shade, but cause us to ponder the questions that go beyond the material world?

I could continue with the ritual reading of a book as strange as Kohelet, but my readers have already guessed at the message. Sukkot, like all the other sacred days of our calendar, doesn't have one single message, but rather a complex set of teachings to be learned over many cycles of celebration.

Chag Samayach!

Temporary homes

As we ease into Sukkot, our festival of temporary abodes, the Canada geese are making their way south to their temporary shelter from our inclement winter. I see them graze in large numbers on my campus. York University, it seems, is along their flying path, one of the way stations to and from their more temperate home.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Twice yearly, gaggles of them settle on our grassy meadows, our green commons, lawns between buildings, even sodded strips between rows of cars in our parking lot. Wherever you turn, you see them in large clusters. Then, suddenly, they are gone.

I once remarked to the former president of the university that I sometimes think of these geese as enchanted students, with long overdue incompletes or other obligations to fulfil, transformed into these honking birds and yoked to our campus until something magical frees them from the spell. But enchantment aside, Canada geese share with our students a relationship to our campus that is at once temporary and recurring, a way station between what came before and what comes after. The university campus is something of a home, but not the only home and not forever.

The migrating patterns of Canada geese exemplify the paradox of Sukkot: the permanence of our temporary spaces, the temporariness of our permanent ones. Where is their true home? They lay eggs each summer at the same nesting grounds; they sustain and strengthen themselves on the bounties of gentler climates at the same refuges. They travel in set ways, stopping to rest and eat in the same fields.

Is home where they breed and grow their families? Is home where they take out turf during their goslings' adolescence, where the families find material conditions that best sustain them? Is home the familiar places between those two spots, a place of restorative succor when strength gives way?

During a period of several years when I lived in Toronto but worked in the United States, I travelled twice weekly through the Philadelphia airport. Located amid marshlands just south of the city, the airport was contiguous with a rest stop of these peripatetic geese. During the right seasons, I would see gaggles of them foraging as I exited or entered the airport. I felt a kinship with those Canadian geese, fellow flyers, bound to or away from a Canadian home.

Some Canada geese choose not to migrate at all. Urban spread has created conditions that allow some flocks access to food and shelter even during winter months. Other flocks have established permanent residence in auspicious grounds along what was once their migration path; nesting, feeding and growing all in one area. Still other flocks have established themselves in regions where they were taken by human hands, such as New Zealand. Thriving in homes established by their own volition or by force, they create, if you will, a diaspora community of Canada geese.

Does a trace of the true north linger somehow, in the lilt of their honking, in the unanswered urge to take flight at certain seasonal changes?

The homes we have left, those we have made, those we have lost, those we yearn for, all leave their traces, complicating for us the very idea of home. Whether on a personal, familial, or national level, we know that while the idea of home may be fixed and permanent, no individual home can be.

The festival of Sukkot, while commemorating the temporary desert huts of the Israelites travelling from the inhospitable yet familiar home of slavery to the yearned-for but daunting promised home of the future, reminds us of the impermanence of all our homes and the imperative to make home for ourselves and for others however we can.

We might think of homemaking, then, as an act of imitatio dei. The 11th-century Hebrew poet Yehuda Halevi grappled with the unsettling pull of the unknown homeland of the Holy Land, destabilizing him in the home he knew in Spain. He wrote:

Me'az me'on ha-ahava hayita
Az hanu ahavay ba-asher hanita.

Ever since You were the home of love for me,
My love has lived where You have lived.

The Kirshner File

Iraq remains a work in progress

Seven years after the United States and its allies invaded Iraq, toppling the brutal dictatorship of Saddam Hussein and boldly changing the balance of power in the Middle East, Iraq has entered a new, uncertain phase in its often turbulent contemporary history.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

On Aug. 31, the United States officially ended its combat role in Iraq, transferring that onerous responsibility to Iraq's army and police and thereby paving the way for the full withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq in 2011.

In announcing the milestone, U.S. President Barack Obama was true to one of his key campaign promises. Before he assumed the presidency, Obama opposed the war, saying it had been a mistake of the first magnitude and a waste of national resources. Once he found himself in the White House, he acted decisively on his beliefs.

Declaring it was time "to turn the page," Obama said he would focus on domestic issues, namely the wobbly economy, and on the sputtering war in Afghanistan, which has become America's longest.

About 50,000 U.S. troops will remain in Iraq until the end of 2011, less than one-third the number of soldiers stationed there at the height of the "surge" in 2007, when some 20,000 reinforcements were sent to prop up security in Baghdad and Anbar province in the face of a mounting insurgency.

U.S. President Barack Obama

The duties of the American garrison in Iraq will be to support and train Iraqi security forces, protect U.S. diplomats, civilian workers and facilities, and carry out counter-terrorism operations.

Given the current instability in Iraq, which is still very much plagued by sectarian violence pitting Shiite Muslims against Sunni Muslims, there is a better-than-average possibility that a residual American force will remain behind once the bulk of American soldiers are withdrawn.

The reason is clear. On the eve of Obama's speech proclaiming an end to U.S. combat operations, insurgents brazenly launched a series of attacks in 13 cities and towns from Mosul in the north to Basra in the south.

The roadside mines, car bombs and hit-and-run shootings claimed the lives of more than 50 Iraqis, putting the United States and the Iraq government on notice that the insurgency is still a major factor to be reckoned with and that the last chapter of the war has yet to be written.

Observers will not be surprised if the United States leaves a permanent military force in Iraq after 2011. In a recent New York Times op-ed piece, Paul Wolfowitz, the deputy U.S. secretary of defence from 2001 to 2005 and one of the architects of the 2003 invasion, wrote that the United States has vested interests in Iraq and must, therefore, maintain a military presence there, like in South Korea and Germany. As he put it, "At a minimum, we need Iraq to be a stable country, at peace both within its borders and with its neighbours. And we should help Iraq to one day become a leader of political and economic progress in the Middle East."

There are compelling reasons why the United States may have to stay in Iraq long after 2011.

Iraq, still a work in progress, continues to be beset by an insurgency, which rises and falls in intensity. The insurgents are a mix of disaffected Iraqi secular nationalists who lost their positions after the collapse of Saddam Hussein's Baathist regime, Islamic radicals from Iraq and other Arab countries who subscribe to the tenets of Al Qaeda and common criminals trying to take advantage of a generally chaotic situation.

The insurgency erupted shortly after the Americans conquered Iraq in a lightning "shock and awe" war whose overarching objective was regime change. With too few troops on the ground, the United States was hard-pressed to suppress the insurgency, which grew by leaps and bounds and which of late has ominously spread into the fortified Green Zone, the centre of power in Baghdad, and the international airport area.

As of last week, more than 4,400 U.S. soldiers had been killed by insurgents, most of them having been the victims of roadside bombings.

Since the surge, American casualties have fallen sharply. But the insurgency is still a disconcerting fact of life in Iraq, and it is highly doubtful whether the reconstituted Iraqi army and police will be able to deal with it without the Americans' assistance.

Rampant sectarianism, the bane of Iraq since the invasion, is yet another reason why an American presence will be required in Iraq for many more years.

The minority Sunnis, who ruled Iraq until 2003, have yet to come to terms with the post-war Shiite order. With American approval, Shiite politicians have taken control of Iraq, ushering in a new political era but leaving a festering sense of resentment in Sunni ranks.

At the height of the turmoil in Iraq in 2005 and 2006, Sunni insurgents bombed Shiite mosques and institutions, hoping to throw the country into a state of civil war. Iraq, for a while, descended into that terrible abyss. But with the surge in place, Iraq avoided the spectre of a full-blown, open-ended civil war.

Nonetheless, Iraq has yet to resolve a political impasse that has kept the nation on edge since the general election in March. The election, the fruit of an ambitious U.S. plan to convert Iraq into a functioning Arab democracy, failed to produce a decisive outcome, leaving Iraq badly fractured along sectarian lines.

Iraq's Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki

Nuri Kamal al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister and probably Iraq's leading Shiite politician, won 89 parliamentary seats, falling far short of forming a majority government. His chief rival, Ayad Allawi, a Shiite who represents many Sunnis and who was once prime minister himself, won 91 seats. The remaining seats are held by a melange of Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish parties.

Through indiscriminate bombings, the insurgents have attempted to exploit the deadlock, while the Americans have encouraged the formation of a coalition government to defuse the crisis. Joe Biden, the U.S. vice-president, was recently dispatched to Iraq by Obama to promote a power-sharing agreement, but he returned to Washington empty-handed, leaving the impression that Iraqi politicians are a bickering, self-serving and ineffectual lot.

In the meantime, al-Maliki presides over a caretaker government that seems incapable of fully delivering such basic services as electricity and potable water supplies.

For the Americans, this is a source of profound disappointment. Ten days before launching the invasion of Iraq, the then-president of the United States, George W. Bush, promised Iraqis that "the life of the Iraqi citizen is going to dramatically improve."

With Washington having invested $53 billion in reconstructing Iraq, its biggest nation-building project since the Marshall Plan after World War II, a modest measure of progress has been achieved.

According to a report issued by the International Monetary Fund, the Iraqi economy is expected to grow by seven per cent annually for the next few years. But there is a long way to go, since Iraq was virtually broken by United Nations sanctions from 1991 onward.

Apart from helping Iraq with its slow and painful recovery, the Americans will be needed to contain Iranian influence. In retrospect, the downfall of Saddam Hussein was a strategic windfall for Iran. For the past seven years, Iran has upgraded economic relations with Iraq, meddled in Iraqi domestic politics and reportedly supplied insurgents with weapons. If the Americans withdraw all their forces from Iraq, Iran could well be the main beneficiary, a development that would suit neither the United States nor Israel.

Bnai Torah celebrates 50th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Congregation B'nai Torah will kick off its 50th anniversary year with a gala dinner Oct. 6 and follow up with a mission to Israel this winter, among other activities.

The north Toronto congregation, located on Patricia Avenue, is made up of a warm group of people who get along well despite differing philosophies and who are well-educated Jewishly but still want to learn, said Rabbi Yirmiya Milevsky, who will be installed officially at the event.

Rabbi Milevsky became the Orthodox shul's leader 13 months ago. His predecessor, Rabbi Raphael Marcus, died in 2007 of cancer after having served B'nai Torah for 27 years.

Rabbi Marcus' legacy lives on at the shul, Rabbi Milevsky said. "He was concerned for the welfare of every individual."

Longtime members recall previous rabbis going back to Rabbi Shlomo Jakobovits, brother of the late former British Chief Rabbi Immanuel Jakobovits. Rabbi Sholom Gold followed him, and then Rabbi Shmuel Stauber.

Founding member Marvin Wenner, 73, a board member and past president, remembers the days before the shul had a rabbi, when as a young married student he attended services in a nearby apartment. Within a year or so, they moved to a storefront on Transwell Avenue.

Mark Lane and his family moved into the area in July 1961, when Bathurst was just a narrow road north of Finch Avenue.

Lane, now 81, recalls attending the congregation's first High Holiday services at Pleasant Avenue Public School, for "the grand amount of $5 a ticket."

Over the next few years, the congregation grew, and it shared the storefront with Eitz Chaim Schools before the school opened a branch just west of the shul's current location.

When the fledgling congregation purchased its land, a decision was made that it would be "a small institution… so we could pay for it," said Wenner.

The congregation used a pre-fab structure before its own synagogue was built about 40 years ago.

The women's balcony was added at a later date, and, at first, the congregation had moveable chairs on a concrete floor in the sanctuary, said Wenner. Some of the pews now in the men's section were given to B'nai Torah by Shaarei Shomayim Congregation when it sold its building on St. Clair Avenue West, he added.

B'nai Torah's membership has declined from up to 350 families at its height to between 200 and 250 in recent years, in large part because of one of the values it espouses.

A strongly Zionist congregation, B'nai Torah has many former members and children of members living in Israel.

Part of the 50th-anniversary Israel trip, scheduled for Feb. 20 to March 3, will be a reunion with former members and children of members who have made aliyah.

Jack Kahn, chair of the 50th anniversary celebrations and a past president of the congregation, said the shul claims the largest such group in the city, numbering in the hundreds.

The shul is also planning "a major Shabbaton," inviting former members who have moved north to Thornhill or farther south in the city, said Kahn, a member for 42 years.

B'nai Torah is "still a vibrant congregation," said Lane.

Shul president Jack Martell – 65, and also a longtime member – was particularly enthused by this year's Rosh Hashanah services.

"This was an effort to try to get the whole congregation excited and singing along, and it worked beautifully," he said of the davening led by a few members who had made a CD of the tunes they would use. The CDs were distributed to congregants so they could become familiar with them before the holidays.

In the past few years, Martell and his wife have been involved in a different type of musical endeavour at the shul, arranging classical music concerts.

"We want [the shul] to be a pleasurable place for learning, for davening and for socializing," he said.

The congregation is "working on many different fronts to attract new young families," he added.

Among the initiatives are mortgage assistance, get-togethers and classes geared to young families.

Holocaust Memorial marks its 18th anniversary

Holocaust survivors and their families commemorated the 18th anniversary of the Holocaust Memorial in Earl Bales Park with a Yizkor service on Sept. 12. Some 250 people attended the ceremony, including Thornhill MP Peter Kent, MPP Monte Kwinter and former Toronto mayor Mel Lastman. Seen clockwise from left are participants gathered around the memorial, Lastman speaking to the gathering, Kwinter, second from left, participating in the candlelighting ceremony with survivors and their families, and children lighting candles.

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

Number One in a Series New Challenges. Eternal Strength.

LET'S TEACH HER ABOUT HER JEWISH ROOTS BEFORE SOMEONE ELSE DOES.

Throughout history, the Jewish People have endured unimaginable hardships that often threatened Jewish existence itself. We have survived them all. And today, with the same steadfast determination, we stand strongly against new threats.

A global movement is questioning Israel's right to exist, revising Jewish history and attempting to weaken Jewish identity among our young. Our community has an historic opportunity to collectively combat these disturbing developments.

Your support will allow UJA Federation to fund bold programs that nurture a new spirit of Jewish activism, encourage more young people to experience Israel and inspire a new generation about their Jewish roots.

Let's work together to keep our youth proud and strong.

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL

Time stumbles with shoddy journalism

The Sept. 13 Time magazine cover story by Karl Vick, "Why Israel Doesn't Care About Peace," has caused a storm of protest over its insistence that Israeli Jews are too busy making money to care about peace with the Palestinians.

The cover image, with the title boldly centred, is a large Magen David made up of daisies meant to emphasize the "We don't care" attitude. The cover is insidious, if not defamatory. So, too, is the way Vick begins his piece (a condensed version of which appears online): two Ashdod realtors, Heli and Eli, are introduced as the typical Israeli Jews so committed to commerce that they wouldn't dare think of letting rockets fired from Gaza disrupt their sales.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Following this Shylock-like hook, Vick sums up what he claims is the attitude of the majority of Israeli Jews: "In the week that three presidents, a king and their own prime minister gather at the White House to begin a fresh round of talks on peace between Israel and the Palestinians, the truth is, Israelis are no longer preoccupied with the matter. They're otherwise engaged; they're making money… A watching world may still define their country by the blood feud with the Arabs whose families used to live on this land and whether that conflict can be negotiated away, but Israelis say they have moved on."

If they've moved on, exactly what negotiating process is Israel engaged in, once again, with the Palestinians?

Vick apparently isn't concerned about such inconvenient facts that only serve to contradict his thesis.

Indeed, contradictions abound.

On Sept. 2, the day Time posted an abstract of Vick's story online, Richard Stengel, the managing editor, appeared on MSNBC's Morning Joe show to promote the story and to praise Vick, his new Jerusalem bureau chief. While insisting that "most Israelis don't care about peace anymore, don't think it's possible," Stengel said that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "is a little bit out ahead of his constituents."

But he later contradicted himself when, appearing on media critic Howard Kurtz's CNN show Reliable Sources, he said that "there are plenty of people who argue… that, in fact, Netanyahu is just giving the appearance that he actually wants peace, and to negotiate, because really he wants the U.S. to help him with Iran."

So which way is it? Either Stengel believes that Netanyahu is "out ahead" of his constituents and committed to peace, or he believes that Netanyahu's "with them" in not caring about the peace process at all. If it's the latter, then Stengel is, in effect, calling Netanyahu a deceitful manipulator. But he can't have it both ways.

Vick, too, is full of contradictions and inconsistencies. He first attempts to back up his thesis by referring to a "March poll," which he doesn't reference, showing that just eight per cent of Israeli Jews consider the conflict to be their " most urgent problem." Yet he then acknowledges that with former Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's rejection of "a striking package of Israeli concessions at Camp David" in 2000, and the "suffering wave of suicide bombings" inflicted on them, Israelis "saw no reason to keep hope alive." Vick, however, failed to note that current PA President Mahmoud Abbas rejected a package of even greater concessions from then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert in 2008. No wonder Israelis are disillusioned.

None of this justifies Time's thesis that Israeli Jews are indifferent about peace. Israeli polls have consistently shown over many years that about 70 per cent of Israelis are prepared for difficult compromises with the Palestinians, as long as they feel they have a reliable partner who's genuinely committed to peace and will end the conflict once and for all. Today, they understandably lack that assurance. But their wariness ought not be confused with callous, selfish indifference – let alone greed.

In perhaps the ultimate inconsistency of his piece, Vick acknowledged this fact when he wrote of "the huge Israeli majority who in poll after poll say a two-state solution is best, but are dubious that it will ever happen, because the Palestinians won't play ball."

At bottom, what we have here is nothing but shoddy journalism from a major and still influential U.S. publication, brought even lower by its resort to anti-Semitic stereotypes. It marks the pathetic descent of Time.

Wilf challenges youth to stay engaged

MK seeks to forge 'new contract' between Israel and world Jewry

Wilf stressed the importance of speaking to Jewish youths worldwide about Israel and challenging them to stay informed and engaged. She left the crowd at The House with an optimistic message. "I think, ultimately, that just how Israel has come out triumphant from all the various previous challenges, it will come out from this one, too," she said.

Speaking with The CJN in a wide-ranging exclusive interview on Sept. 14, the day after her talk, Wilf spoke openly about her desire to forge a "new contract" between Israel and world Jewry and her eye-opening experience with Canadian support for her country under the current Conservative government.

On the former, Wilf said that according to the "old contract" Israel told Jews in the Diaspora that there were only two ways to be a good Jew from the Israeli perspective: by giving money, and lots of it, or making aliyah. "Today, this [contract] is not relevant to the vast majority of Jews."

Wilf proposed that a new contract reflect the realities of life in an interconnected world. "It should be much more in tune with the lives young people live today, very mobile, very connected lives, fluid lives. The notion that you're connected to one place from age zero to 100 is, I think, nonsensical. People have more of a sense that they can have a relationship with the country. They can come, they can stay for a few years, leave, come back and have professional and personal network."

She suggested Jews everywhere make Israel their first "or second" home.

"I don't mean buying real estate in Jerusalem," she said. "I mean that Israel becomes a major relationship in your life, physically. It should be a place you can go and spend some of your life and go and come back. There are numerous ways to make Israel your own, it's not just about living there all your life."

Asked about her view of Canada in her new role as an MK, Wilf said she found the country's support for Israel "remarkable."

"It's not well-known in Israel how good a friend Canada has become under Prime Minister [Stephen Harper]. And to the extent I can bring that message back to Israel, I will," she said.

Wilf speculated that Israelis haven't yet latched on to Canada's political support for their country because they still, mistakenly, view it as a place hostile to them due to past media coverage of events here.

"[Israelis] still have a sense in which Canada is a place where there is a strong Palestinian community, where there is a lot of anti-Israel activity," she said.

"They remember [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's aborted visit to [Concordia University] in 2002. So there's always this thinking that Canada is more of a European-style country and less of a North American one. Even the educated class [in Israel] have not been aware of this big change in Canada."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

How do you make a lulav shake?

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

To make a lulav shake, mix one quart lime sherbet with two litres ginger ale. Pour into a tall, clear glass. Insert "lulav" (celery stalk) and lemon slice and serve. [http://bit.ly/sukk14]

OK, now that I've got your attention, let's look at some Sukkot sites for kids.

Children can learn about Sukkot at several sites written just for them, such as Virtual Jerusalem Holidays [http://bit.ly/sukk01] and TorahTots. [http://bit.ly/sukk02] Teachers will appreciate the holiday backgrounders and activities provided by the Jewish Agency for Israel. [http://bit.ly/sukk03]

Hebrewpodcasts.com teaches conversational Hebrew through everyday situations. Although many of the features require payment, you can enjoy the audio podcasts free. Learn a few words of Hebrew as Rena, Noa and Danny prepare to build, decorate and sleep in their sukkah. [http://bit.ly/sukk04]

How many board games have you played that call for "a die, a copy of a Jewish Bible and access to your pantry?" That's what you'll need to play the ingenious Kitchen Table Harvest Game in your sukkah. This game has spaces on its board – which you can that mention food. For example, if you happen to land on the square that says "Proverbs 15:17," look up the verse and you'll find the quotation "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith." Then go into your kitchen to look for herbs (or if applicable, an ox). The first person to collect 10 food items is the winner. [http://bit.ly/sukk05]

Still on the game front, now that your kids are knowledgeable about the holiday, it's time to play Jewpardy (just as in the TV game show Jeopardy, responses are always delivered in the form of a question.) Here's a sample: [http://bit.ly/sukk06]

Sukkot is one of the three ____ holidays.

a) What are happy?
b) What are pilgrimage?
c) What are high?

If your kids have access to a sukkah, here are some decorating ideas for them. Instead of stringing up yet another paper chain, follow the instructions at VJ Holidays to create a harvest-time "food chain" using cranberries, crabapples, popcorn, peppers, onions and small eggplants. [http://bit.ly/sukk08]

The Shema Yisrael Torah Network has Sukkot-related drawings that can be printed and coloured. Traditional pictures show the construction of a sukkah and men and boys shaking the lulav and etrog. [http://bit.ly/sukk09] On a page from the Jewish Theological Seminary's Kids' Corner site, you'll find a young woman shaking her lulav. [http://bit.ly/sukk10]

It might be a few years before your kids are ready to build their own genuine sukkah, but meantime plenty of miniatures can be crafted from materials such as Popsicle sticks. [http://bit.ly/sukk11] Or how about a wearable one mounted on a hat? [http://bit.ly/sukk12]

Follow the lead of the kids at the Hebrew Academy of Tidewater in Virginia Beach, Va., and make an edible sukkah. With construction materials such as graham cracker walls, a pretzel-stick roof and Trix cereal decorations, you can have your sukkah and eat it, too. [http://bit.ly/sukk13]

Have a very happy holiday.

Our unique sense of security

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

When I went to synagogue on Friday night with my friend, Avi, I was surprised by his sense of awe.

It wasn't the beauty of the song or the flow of the rabbi's sermon that enamored him, but the glass entranceway to the building. Avi is a Turkish Jew visiting North America to complete a medical observership. In Turkey, after the bombing of an Istanbul synagogue in 2003, entering a synagogue is a 10-minute process of identity checks and metal detectors, bomb-resistant walls and double-lock doors. Young men undergo training and volunteer with the Jewish community's security agency and serve as guards protecting synagogues and other Jewish agencies.

I see the newly constructed glass entrance of my synagogue as bright and airy architectural design. To Avi, the glass was unsettling. While he admired the freedom it represented, he also seemed to edge away from it, keeping his distance from the perceived vulnerability.

I am a proud member of the first generation of Jews to live free from existential threat. Not only is my synagogue secure with glass windows and doors that open to the street below, but I'm blessed to live in a multicultural society that embraces my religion. I wear a kippah wherever I go, I can send my children to Jewish schools, camps and youth groups, and I can board an airplane, fly to Israel and return freely a week later. These freedoms afforded by our open society are unparalleled in Jewish history.

This warm relationship with society at large offers my generation tremendous freedom, but at the same time, it distances us from the narrative of Jewish history and from the experiences of many contemporary Jewish communities around the world.

When reading the Purim megillah, many of my peers and I cringe at the conclusion. After Mordechai and Esther save the Jews, King Achashverosh grants them permission to slay their remaining enemies. "So the Jews struck at their enemies with the sword, slaughtering and annihilating, they wreaked their will upon their enemies."

On the first day, the Jews killed 500 men in Shushan. Fearful that more enemies were in their midst, Esther appealed to the king for a second day of amnesty, and the Jews killed another 300. Without ever having faced an enemy, many young Jews can't relate to the fear of the Jews of Shushan and, therefore, struggle with the Purim genocide wrought by the Jews.

In a similar way, we're disconnected from Israelis. Be it Palestinian terrorism or the threat of a nuclear Iran, Israelis have always lived with an existential threat. This stark reality informs their sense of security and their relationship with the outside world. As young North American Jews form their understanding of Israel, Israelis and the peace process, they're often dismayed by Israel's seemingly hawkish behaviour.

The building of the security fence, Operation Cast Lead and Israel's response to the Gaza flotilla can only be understood when taken in the context of an existential threat. When we consider the increasing detachment of young Canadian Jews to Israel, we must recognize the difference between their experience and that of their parents, who grew up with images of the Six Day War, as well as that of their grandparents who survived the Holocaust and Israelis who live knowing the fear of an enemy.

The Jews of Shushan, contemporary Israelis, Turkey's Jews and countless other Jewish communities over the centuries have faced real and direct threats. While their worldview is informed by their insecurity, mine is shaped by my security.

Israeli wine and Canadian cheese

Hillel House in Ottawa planned to hold its first social activity last week – a wine and cheese party. But the significance of this particular wine and cheese party goes beyond just drinking wine with a complement of cheese, as it was co-sponsored by the Israel Advocacy Committee (IAC) and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

The event, called Israeli Wine and Canadian Cheese, was organized by a mix of students involved with CJPAC and the IAC, as well as supporters of both student organizations, which plan to work together in the upcoming year.

"The wine and cheese will be the first of many events that the IAC puts on to support Israel, and we will get to hear some great new ideas for this year's campaign in supporting Israel," IAC marketing and communications chair Ilan Orzy said prior to the gathering.

With their activities, the IAC and CJPAC hope to enable students to get more involved with political figures.

The plan for the first event was to provide an open environment for students who support Israel to meet each other in a social setting and to help build a strong bridge between the two organizations. With good co-operation between the two, we can expect a year filled with many events on campus to educate those who are unaware of what the truth about Israel is, as well as other events supporting Israel in different ways.

These kinds of activities should build a strong foundation for an attempt to ultimately rid Ottawa university and college campuses of Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) and, more importantly, hate crimes such as the one current IAC university president Mark Klibanov and his roommate, Nick Bergamini, had to endure in Hull, Que., when they were chased by a machete-wielding attacker for their support of Israel.

The aforementioned incident has become a major driving force for the IAC, because it provides a perfect example of the type of hostility that can result from anti-Israel events such as the annual IAW.

Last year, IAW was unanimously condemned by Ontario MPPs, who said the event is not constructive. Thornhill Progressive Conservative MPP Peter Shurman said that "Israeli Apartheid Week is not a dialogue, it's a monologue, and it is an imposition of a view by the name itself – the name is hateful, it is odious."

The IAC and CJPAC plan to become the flip side of the apartheid week coin and promote an open dialogue based on facts rather than religious dogma. Events such as the wine and cheese social should provide a strong start for the year.

It's expected that there will be more activities of this type and the result will be a more educated campus at Carleton University, the University of Ottawa and Algonquin College. With the strong presence of IAC and CJPAC, Ottawa should become a healthier, safer campus for Jewish students.

Tolerance a Sephardi hallmark

The months of Elul and Tishrei are two of my favourite months of the year. The beauty of autumn coupled with the breathtaking landscapes and seascapes of Vancouver, one of the most beautiful cities in the world, remains striking every time I walk to my synagogue. But more than that, I am excited by the imminent holidays and the profound meaning underlying them.

Sephardi Window
By Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Beginning with Rosh Chodesh Elul and culminating with Simchat Torah, we strive toward tshuvah (repentance). It's a time for introspection and reflection regarding our relationship not only with God, but with our fellow beings.

The well-known acronym for Elul, "ani ledodi vedodi li" (Song of Songs 6:3) – I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine – alludes to the love we have for God and God for us.

The Chida, Rabbi Chaim Yosef David Azulai (1724-1807), offers another, lesser known acronym for Elul. The verse "ish lere'ehu umatanot laevyonim" (Esther 9:22) – each person to their friend and gifts to the poor – speaks of two of four commandments we observe on Purim. We send portions of food to our neighbours and distribute money to the poor. The Chida explains that during the month of Elul, we are meant to reflect upon our relationships with our fellow human beings. It's the time when we ask for forgiveness and renew our journey with our fellow man.

As a Sephardi Jew, I find that the Sephardi tradition places great emphasis on unity and camaraderie. During the different holidays throughout the year, we sing traditional melodies in unison, creating a sense of harmony and solidarity.

In addition to Slichot and piyutim during the High Holidays, the melodies of specific chants composed by our Sephardi poets are chanted in the sukkah. In this way, the tunes are sung joyfully with one voice, demonstrating our unity with God – and among ourselves.

In my synagogue, we have a beautiful tradition harking back to the great Sephardi sage Rav Yosef Chaim of Baghdad, the Ben Ish Chai (1832-1909). Before beginning the Kol Nidre service, we beseech one another for forgiveness. What a hopeful way to begin this holy day, all congregants coming as one to serve God by tending to our own, very human relationships.

One of the most powerful messages I have ever received was from a rabbi who told me that in Sephardi countries, all Jews had a sense of belonging to a synagogue and the Jewish community, irrespective of their levels of observance. People were non-judgmental, and the rabbi would converse easily with everyone. This Judaism in no way compromised any Jewish law or concept. Rather, it was a Judaism that was tolerant and accepting, adam lachavero (each of the other). It's an ideal I try to implement in my community.

Instead of each attempting to press his own case exclusively before God at the price of delegitimizing others, for whatever reason, each helps to ensure his own tshuvah by according love and kindness and the benefit of the doubt to others. The judging of our neighbours is, after all, best left to them—and to God. Only our love, kindness and respect can help them – and us – in our respective tshuvot.

Let us all adopt this important message during these holy days – to recognize the humanity of others and to show tolerance to those who are different without compromising our own convictions. This very Jewish approach goes a long way to assure room for each and joy for all.

Rabbi Ilan Acoca is spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Hamidrash in Vancouver.

Camp offers alternative holiday service

By SHARON CHISVIN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

Shortly after moving back to Winnipeg with my young family in the early 1990s, I was invited to join my sister and a couple of her friends for an informal alternative Rosh Hashanah service they were organizing at our Winnipeg Beach cottage.

Almost 20 years later, that informal get-together has evolved into the annual Camp Massad Rosh Hashanah service, a family-friendly, interactive alternative service that attracts almost 200 people each year.

The Rosh Hashanah service initially moved to Camp Massad about 16 years ago largely because it outgrew our family cottage and because Massad happened to be located nearby. The fact that most of us who were involved with the service were also Massad alumni was also a major factor.

Since taking over sponsorship of the service, Massad has proudly promoted it as an informal, participatory, family-orientated alternative to traditional synagogue services. Like Massad itself, a Hebrew immersion Zionist camp that has flourished about 60 kilometres north of Winnipeg for almost 60 years, the Rosh Hashanah service emphasizes the building of community and the joyful celebration of Judaism.

The service, which took place on the second day of Rosh Hashanah, features a laid-back blend of traditional prayers, Torah insights, contemporary readings, humour, song and shtick. It has been led all these years by the same three volunteers, my sister, Leah Braemer, a Hebrew bilingual elementary school teacher, Miriam Baron and Shelley Werner, who provide musical direction and accompaniment. The Massad Alumni Choir, which performs at about a dozen rites of passage and community events throughout the year, is also integral to the service.

The success of the service relies heavily on audience participation. Children are called up to read many of the prayers and responsive readings, and are encouraged to march down the aisles behind the Torah and gather around the shofar blower – a local school principal and Massad alumnus – calling out tekiah and shvarim. All of the congregants are invited to join the choir in singing a variety of liturgical melodies, contemporary Hebrew songs and a few now-classic songs written expressly for the service by Baron and Werner.

In lieu of a Torah reading, a small band of mostly Camp Massad alumni perform a shtick that traditionally revolves around the major Rosh Hashanah themes of repentance, renewal and review. This year's shtick, hosted by Katie Kugel and Pauline Keegel, parodied many of the big news stories of the year, including interviews with environmentalist "Al Gornish," literary critic "Booker Prize" and a clip from the blockbuster movie "Avinutar."

Each year Braemer adds new readings and reflections to the service to keep it fresh and engaging, and to gear it specifically to the ages of those who will be attending. While most of the congregants return year after year, each new season also brings with it a few new faces. Many of the newcomers have heard through word-of-mouth about the relaxed atmosphere and sense of fun and community that prevails.

"The warm, informal atmosphere at the service is inviting and makes people feel comfortable," Braemer reflected. "The music and singing invite participation from all members and ages, and there's a strong sense of belonging to a community."

This sense of community was especially evident during two particularly poignant moments at this year's service. The first occurred when a young family brought their infant daughter up to the bimah for her baby naming. The second occurred when about a dozen Camp Massad staff and campers who happened to be at the service stood up to sing a tribute song for Gilad Schalit, the Israeli soldier who was kidnapped by Hamas, that had been written during a camp program earlier in the summer.

Following the service, apples, honey and challah are distributed and those in attendance are invited to make the short trek across the road to Lake Winnipeg for Tashlich. Standing on the shores of this great lake and bearing witness to the blasts of the shofar is indeed a profound experience, although, I must admit that this year, I skipped the ritual in order to help set up the dining hall for the kiddush.

Even this, the informal way in which the dining hall is set up, the simple luncheon food and the reliance on volunteers for most of the event's organization, set up and clean up, is reflective of what both Camp Massad and its alternative Rosh Hashanah service stand for. What matters at Massad, and at the service, is that everyone feels part of a family and part of a community, and that they can freely and fully celebrate their Jewish culture, religion and identity. The atmosphere at Massad is always warm, welcoming and inviting, and so, too, is the atmosphere at its annual Rosh Hashanah service.

This, of course, explains the increasing popularity of the service, which now attracts so many people that, as Baron says, Massad eventually will have to start offering an alternative service to its alternative service.

Toronto's Jewish community responds to threats against Israel and Jewish life

Launched one month ago, UJA Campaign has already raised over $20 million

By Daniel Horowitz

Taking on the responsibility of chairing United Jewish Appeal Campaign 2011 is no simple task. However, UJA Campaign chairs Sherry Firestone and Jeff Rosenthal, and the chair of UJA's Women's Philanthropy Sarena Koschitzky, are not interested in what is simple; they are interested in what will make a difference in today's – and tomorrow's - Jewish world.

The trio - that participated in a whirlwind, four-day fact-finding mission to Israel prior to the August 24 launch of this year's campaign - is fully committed to doing whatever is necessary to make this year's pivotal campaign a successful one.

UJA Campaign 2011 has already raised more than $20 million toward its goal of $66 million in the wake of threats to our children, our grandchildren and our way of life created by the global movement designed to delegitimize Israel as a Jewish state. Campaign 2011 dollars will continue to fund transformative change for Jews in need here in Toronto, in Israel and around the world. At the same time, dollars raised beyond last year's campaign total will support initiatives designed to instill a strong Jewish identity in our young, including a deeper connection to Israel. In the course of doing so, UJA will provide the next generation with the tools they need to successfully answer the challenges posed by those who attack the core of the Jewish people through their efforts against Israel.

"Thousands of our young people – our future leaders – are not equipped to deal with today's dangerous climate," says Firestone, a partner in Monterra Capital Corporation, and a native of Vancouver who came east to attend the University of Toronto. "Without a proud and strong Jewish identity and a love of Israel, young people simply can't withstand the onslaught of those who seek Israel's demise. There are all too many who opt out of Jewish life entirely. We must take swift and bold action to empower our youth and give them the confidence to lead full Jewish lives with joy, pride, strength and conviction."

"Each and every day we, and particularly our young, are inundated with negative messages about Israel and its nature as a Jewish state through the news media, electronic media, and on campus," says Rosenthal, co-founder and managing partner of Imperial Capital Group Ltd. "Among other goals, the current anti-Israel offensive is designed to wither ties of young Jews with Israel. In light of these challenges, UJA is seeking to raise an additional $2.5 million during this campaign."

UJA has already initiated many effective programs in Toronto, designed to enhance young people's Jewish identity, including their attachment to Israel. Additional funds would allow UJA to do much more with these initiatives as well as new programs. For example, UJA seeks to cut the annual Birthright Israel wait list by 50% as well as focusing on sending more children to Jewish summer camp, enhancing Jewish education – both day and supplementary, and much more.

"Experiences such as Birthright Israel have a proven track record, but because of attacks on Israel and the lies that our young are being saturated with day in and day out, we need to act fast to help them combat this," explains Koschitzky, a veteran community leader with a strong family legacy in voluntarism and tikkun olam. "Rather than make small, incremental increases to these programs, we will take a dramatic leap forward with this year's UJA campaign to make sure our young people are connected to Jewish life."

Telethon volunteers come together to create one Super Week

By Dara Newton

This past Sunday, September 12, close to 300 committed community volunteers gathered in the Lipa Green Centre's Tamari Family Hall, in support of United Jewish Appeal's 2011 Campaign. It was a Super Sunday indeed, with over $1.5 million raised.

During the subsequent Super Week – Monday through Thursday – an additional 400 volunteers took to the phones and through their efforts, over 4,000 gifts were received.

UJA's 2011 Campaign, chaired by Sherry Firestone and Jeff Rosenthal, is focused on raising funds to fortify our next generation's Jewish identity, including its connection to Israel.

"Super Sunday was electric. I was so impressed with the CHAT students who were so polite and energetic and IMPACT Toronto, who even gave up the first night of NFL football to come and spend the evening making calls on behalf of UJA," enthused Janice Tkatch, chair, along with David Weinberg, of UJA Campaign 2011 Telethons. "These young people were so upbeat and excited to be a part of Super Sunday and be able to help those who are vulnerable from our community, Israel and abroad."

"From nine a.m. until nine p.m. there were great volunteers coming through the doors," said Weinberg. "Before making calls they all had the opportunity to watch the UJA Campaign video, which sings and raps the message 'It's all about strength, courage, pride and love.' The volunteers during Super Week exhibited these four traits as well. It was wonderful to be a part of this Super Week and I encourage everyone to come out and be a part of the community as we make a difference."

Telethon volunteers filled the Lipa Green Centre's Tamari Family Hall on Super Sunday.

A special thank you to all of the groups that came out including JACS, Hillel, March of the Living, B'nai Tzedek, the hosts of the Guy's Afternoon shift - Richard Bennett, Matthew Diamond, Michael Florence, Jeff Rosenthal and Ben Weinberg; IMPACT Telethon chairs - Shelby Draper, Leila Kohn and Jonathan Tkatch; and IMPACT Telethon Vice-Chairs Lesley Henry and Adi Seitelbach, and all of the remarkable volunteers that participated.

To volunteer at United Jewish Appeal's next set of telethons October 3-7, please call 416.631.5819.

York opens new health science facility

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

It used to be a hockey arena.

Now it houses the latest functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) technology.

Last week, York University officially opened the Sherman Health Science Research Centre, a facility for research in brain and vision, biomechanics, virtual reality and robotics. Planning for the facility, which was completed in December 2009, started in 2007.

The $11.5-million centre, which was converted from an old hockey arena, was named after Honey Sherman, a York University Foundation board member, and her husband, Barry Sherman, president and CEO of the pharmaceutical company Apotex Inc., who donated $5 million to the project.

"Everybody who gives donations has to pick and choose as to where the need is greatest," Barry Sherman said.

"It's York University, an important Canadian university for teaching and research... we tend to concentrate our gifts towards health care. It's good for the scientists, the public and the eventual patients who will benefit. It's a gift to the City of Toronto."

The centre, located on York's Keele campus, is 50,000 square feet and accommodates 150 researchers and students. The facility includes a neuroimaging laboratory with an fMRI machine that's being used for research in areas such as dyslexia, migraines, aging and movement disorders. It also houses a visual and cognitive development project that studies how vision develops in infants, as well as a perceptual neuroscience laboratory and virtual reality laboratory.

Sherman sees the facility's potential for interdisciplinary research as an asset to the university.

"It's very impressive, and it makes a lot of sense. [These fields] are interrelated. To make significant progress in any area you need people of various [fields]," he said, adding that he was particularly impressed with the neuroimaging lab.

"To try to understand the workings of the brain, you need that equipment," he said. "It'll be very useful in developing that understanding when it comes to brain impairment and issues like dementia."

Stan Shapson, York's vice- president of research and innovation, said the facility will provide an ideal work environment for both staff and graduate students.

"We didn't have these kinds of facilities for them yet, so they were doing great work, but you're doing work in a lab that's in the basement of a building. There's potential for interference when you're collecting data. It slows down your work and you're always adjusting equipment," Shapson said.

"Now you have state-of-the-art labs... [The students and researchers] will be able to do better quality work more quickly."

Some of this research includes studying loss of vision in the elderly, developing a robot-guided wheelchair and building robots that can function underwater.

Shapson hopes the facility will help the university forge connections with local hospitals.

"I think we had four presidents of regional hospitals at [the official opening]. That's wonderful. They're looking at this facility as something that could help them," he said.

With the new facilities and York's existing Centre for Vision Research, which is internationally renowned, Shapson sees the potential to attract new researchers and students, as well as to apply existing research to the health care sector.

"I think [this centre] is going to drive new ideas, innovations and treatments. At the end of the day, the hope is to deliver better health outcomes to Canadians," he said.

N.S. native was Israel's 1st tank driver

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Lionel Druker, a native Nova Scotian who became the first tank driver in the Israeli Army in 1948 and later operated thriving tour bus and sightseeing companies in Israel, passed away Aug. 25 in Tel Aviv at age 85.

Born in Sydney, N.S., Druker was the second son of the late Max and Jennie Druker. After graduating from Sydney Academy, he attended Mount Allison University, but left in the spring of 1944 to join the Canadian Army. When World War II in Europe ended in May 1945, he volunteered to fight in the Pacific until the end of the war. He resumed his studies at Mount Allison in the fall of 1945. A year later, Druker was accepted into Dalhousie University Law School.

In December 1947, a few weeks after the United Nations voted to partition Palestine into a Jewish state and an Arab state, Druker was elected national president of Canadian Young Judea, a branch of the Zionist Organization of Canada.

When it appeared likely that a war would erupt, he volunteered to help defend the new State of Israel. Having been trained as a tank operator in the Canadian Army, Druker drove the only Israeli tank and became captain of the first tank corps. The tank he drove has been memorialized and is still displayed on stilts at a museum in Latrun, between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

When a ceasefire was signed about 18 months after the start of the war, Druker had met Rachel Flasher, a Jewish native of pre-partition Palestine, and they were married.

Druker and business partner Arthur Goldberg, originally from Vancouver, started the tour bus company United Tours, as well as a tour company that they successfully ran for almost 25 years.

"Lionel's success can be partly attributed to his charm and personality," said his younger brother, Avvie, by telephone from his Sydney home. "I'm six years younger than Lionel and he left for university when he was 18 and I was 12, but in later years, as we'd visit here or in Israel, I recall Lionel as being great company and a good storyteller. He had a very interesting life."

Druker is survived by his wife, Rachel; sons, Dror (Aviva), Tamir (Illana), Eyal (Cloudia); six grandchildren, all in Israel, and his brother, Avvie in Sydney. He was predeceased by his brother, Sid, of Toronto. Burial took place in Israel.

Enrolment up at Winnipeg's Jewish day school

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After a couple of years of treading water, enrolment is moving upward again at the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) Gray Academy of Jewish Education, which serves kids in kindergarten through Grade 12.

Registration stands at 604 this year, compared to 572 last fall.

Head of school and CEO Rory Paul said that one-third of the new students are from families who have recently immigrated to Winnipeg. More significantly, the other two-thirds are locally born children who have switched over from both the public school system and prestigious private schools such as St. John's-Ravenscourt School or the University of Winnipeg Collegiate program.

"We have had to add a third Grade 3 and a third Grade 4 class this year," Paul said. The school already has four junior kindergarten classes.

Paul attributes the school's success to two factors: the excellence of its teaching staff – which he describes as "second to none" – and its overall quality of education.

"We have done a lot of work in the last couple of years to raise our level of Judaic studies to the top ranks in Canada, and we have worked hard to make certain that our general studies program is also top-notch."

Full tuition at the school is in the range of $7,000 per student. However, the BJE has a sliding scale based on family income and the number of students per family enrolled in the school.

Paul added that the BJE is broadening its mandate this year to include adult education.

"As a result of a two-year strategic planning process, the board has created a new position – co-ordinator of lifelong learning – whose mandate will be to work with the synagogues and the Rady Jewish Community Centre to expand Jewish education in the community with an emphasis on teens and younger adults," he said.

Jewish families also have the option of enrolling their younger children in North America's only elementary public school – and 100 per cent publicly funded – Hebrew bilingual programs, but it seems that each year the number of parents choosing that route continues to decline.

Enrolment in kindergarten to Grade 5 this year in the Hebrew bilingual program at Margaret Park Elementary School in Winnipeg's north end is just 37 students (although there may still be some late enrolments), down from about 50 last year. Class sizes range from four in Grade 2 to nine in Grade 5, with just six students registered in kindergarten (some classes are combined). At its peak 20 years ago, the program had about 180 students.

While the shrinking attendance in the Hebrew bilingual program at Margaret Park reflects the declining Jewish population in the north end, which used to be the heart of Winnipeg's Jewish community, the decline in enrolment in the Hebrew bilingual program (kindergarten to Grade 6) at Brock Corydon Elementary School in south Winnipeg – where most Jews now live – has been rather unexpected.

For years, the program was filled to capacity with about 180 students. Last year, for the first time, that figure dropped – by about 20 students. This year, enrolment has declined further – to 136 – including a kindergarten class of 12.

Principal Ira Udow said the decline may be because younger Jewish families and newer immigrant families are increasingly moving to newer suburbs outside the Winnipeg One School Division catchment area.

(Brock Corydon School is in the Winnipeg One School Division. While Winnipeg One is the city's largest school board, there are another five or six school boards in the suburbs.)

Ohr HaTorah Day School, which operates out of Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun Synagogue in south Winnipeg, had offered another alternative for observant families. Last year, however, the 11-year-old school ran into financial difficulties and was forced to scale back its program. This year, the school is only operating a daycare and kindergarten with a capacity of 40. All the spaces are full and there's a waiting list.

Chabad also operates a small school in Winnipeg. Currently, Oholei Torah School has an enrolment of 12 in preschool and another 14 in a kindergarten-to-Grade 8 program. For the time being, the preschool program is being run out of the home of Rabbi Shmuely and Adina Altein, while K-8 students are housed in the North End Lubavitch Centre.

The plan is to move all the students to the new south Winnipeg Lubavitch Centre at the beginning of November. The building is scheduled to be completed by late October.

Hamilton cantor finds her niche

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rebecca Moses, cantor-educator at Temple Anshe Sholom, in Hamilton, was looking for a specific type of congregation when she was invested as a cantor last year at Hebrew Union College – Jewish Institute of Religion School of Sacred Music.

"I found the place that I was looking for, which was a place that was going to be warm and engaging and welcoming, and a place that wanted to have fun with their services, and that was going to allow me to grow as a cantor, and to grow with me as a congregation – some place that really wanted to sing along, to learn new music, but still sing the old tunes as well," she said in a recent interview, shortly after her official installation as the temple's cantor on Aug. 29.

More than a year after joining the 400-family shul, Moses, 31, believes she's found what she was looking for.

A seventh-generation Jewish Texan on her mother's side (and fifth on her father's), Moses – who was born in New Orleans and raised in San Antonio – had no Canadian connection before taking on her new position at the temple in July 2009.

She sees her work as an educator, running the temple's religious school, as being "quite linked" to the cantorial aspect.

Cantor Rebecca Moses

In addition to the Judaic component of her cantorial knowledge, "the fact that I'm a musician means I get that kids don't always learn in the same ways."

Moses, who also has a bachelor of music in vocal performance, has been teaching for more than half her life, having started as a young teenager at her temple in San Antonio.

"I really learned to love Judaism through teaching it," she said. "We didn't necessarily go to synagogue, but the religious school was very important."

The temple she went to didn't have a cantor, but when Moses – a soprano who began singing and acting as a young child – heard a guest cantor at age 16, she started to think seriously about taking that path herself.

Although she studied guitar and piano in college, she doesn't necessarily play them now, she said.

"I have a wealth of congregants here who are extremely gifted, and I think it's more of my job to find them and to introduce them to the joys of Jewish music that I have found, by inviting them to share their unique talents with the congregation."

Anshe Sholom has a family jam band that leads Friday night services once a month, she said. Moses said she is excited to have "inherited" them from her predecessor, Laura Wolfson, who has retired.

Charged teen receives psychiatric tests

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL - The lawyer defending Maor Attar, 18 – who is charged with the first-degree murder of his younger sister – says his client isn't criminally responsible because he suffers from a mental illness.

At the first court hearing since Attar was charged with the Aug. 9 death of 14-year-old Shirel Attar, Daniel Lighter called Attar "a very sick young man" who may have experienced a psychotic episode associated with schizophrenia.

Lighter told the court that Attar may have been having auditory hallucinations when he allegedly beat and stabbed his sister at their Côte St. Luc home.

The Crown agreed to Lighter's request for more psychiatric tests for Attar before his next court hearing, set for Oct. 8. Attar has been held in the Philippe Pinel Institute since being charged, and did not appear in court at the first hearing on Sept. 8.

Loving Israel in Complicated Times

No one has a monopoly on what it means to be "Pro-Israel."

Jews outside of Israel who love Israel have both a right and, indeed, an obligation to express support in a way that reflects their values. Many Jews- particularly younger ones- are walking away from a relationship with Israel because they refuse to accept the notion that their relationship with Israel can only be defined either as "Israel right or wrong" or as "Israel always wrong." There is an important alternative for North Americans: to love, support and engage with the real Israel: precious, imperfect and passionately worth fighting for.

Sokatch, a dynamic speaker, has been named to The Forward's list of notable Jewish leaders.

Kingston rabbi recovers from brain surgery

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Daniel Elkin is recovering from brain surgery. He can't move his left arm, which is swollen and painful. He gets headaches every now and then. And he's tired most of the time.

But he hasn't lost his sense of humour.

"It just keeps things light. To me, you know, being overly serious is not helpful," said Rabbi Elkin, 66, who has been the spiritual leader of Beth Israel Congregation in Kingston for the past 13 years.

This summer, the rabbi was told that he had a benign brain tumour near his pituitary gland.

He underwent surgery at the end of August at Toronto Western Hospital, where doctors were only able to remove around 75 to 85 per cent of the growth.

"They didn't want to cause any more disruption than they had to to the brain," Rabbi Elkin said, adding that his doctors don't know how leaving part of the growth in place will affect him.

"Apparently I've had it for quite a while, so I've been able to do what I was supposed to do with [the growth in place]. Now that 75 or 80 per cent has disappeared, I should be better off," he said.

The rabbi was released from hospital in early September and is recovering at home, although it's been a "tough grind," he said.

"I developed a pain in my left arm, and I can't move my left arm or hand. It's swollen," he said, adding that his doctors don't yet know why this is happening. "I've had headaches, which is not too usual, but they haven't been consistent."

Rabbi Elkin's wife, Gittle, is optimistic.

"The rabbi is doing great. He came out of surgery with a joke," she said. "Every day he's getting better. He's taking rehabilitative therapies and making good progress."

Before his surgery, Beth Israel congregants and Queen's University students read the entire book of Tehillim for the rabbi.

"We thank everyone who prayed for him," Gittle said. "Please continue praying. He still has a little ways to go."

Rabbi Elkin currently goes to rehabilitative therapy once a week. He's also visited his shul, where a cantor has been hired to take over until he's ready to come back.

"It's all speculation. Some people say [I'll be back] in three months. Some people say six weeks. We've just passed the three-week mark, so it doesn't look like it would be three weeks," he said.

But Rabbi Elkin hasn't been alone.

Queen's students and congregants have been visiting, both when he was in Toronto and at his Kingston home, where last Sunday they helped the rabbi and his wife set up their sukkah.

"I can't do it myself. I think the support I received from the university kids is great," he said. "I think it's terrific. Visiting, having people visit you is, to me, a very important aspect of healing."

For Joey Fox, who's finishing his master's degree in engineering physics at Queen's and helped organize the sukkah-building, Rabbi Elkin is more than a spiritual leader. He's a friend.

"I met him in my first year [as an undergraduate at Queen's]. He was very kind, very sweet. I felt right at home [at Beth Israel]," he said, adding that Beth Israel is the only full-time synagogue in Kingston.

"In many other communities, rabbis play a very important role. They have to look after their congregation. Here, he has to care for the city."

Seven USY grads head to Israel

Compiled by CJN Staff

Seven Canadians are among 93 high school graduates who recently departed for Israel with United Synagogue Youth.

As part of USY's NATIV College/Leadership Program, they'll spend the next nine months studying, touring, volunteering and learning new leadership techniques.

According to USY director Jules Gutin, it's one of the largest NATIV groups in the program's 30-year history. Last year's group had 80 students.

USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

This year's NATIV students come from two Canadian provinces and 23 different U.S. states. The Canadians are Pnina Brown, Sean Haber, Ariel Segal, Tanya Werger, and Hilary Zarnett from Ontario, and Matt Goldberg and Oliver Jacobson from British Columbia.

The leadership training aspects of the program have enabled many NATIV graduates to assume leadership positions throughout the North American Jewish community. Several have become rabbis, while others have gone on to careers in Jewish youth work. Still others have risen to lay leadership positions in their synagogues and regions or have made aliyah. More than half of the staff members on USY programs this past summer were graduates of NATIV.

For more information about NATIV, visit www.nativ.org, or contact Avital Elfant, USY's central shlichah, at 212-533-7800, ext. 1118, or e-mail nativ@uscj.org.

סדר עדיפויות- יהודים קידוצקי

בכתבתי הקודמת דווחתי על רופא ישראלי, ראש מחלקת ילדים בבית חולים שיבא, שמנסה להציל ממוות ילד פלשתינאי שחולה במחלה קשה ונדירה. מחלה אשר דורשת טפול מסובך, ממושך ויקר שעולה למדינת ישראל מליוני דולרים. למרות שבית החולים פנה לרשות הפלשתינאית ולמנהיגי החמאס שיעזרו לשאת בנטל הכלכלי הכבד, ונענתה הבקשה בסירוב. אחד הקוראים, גבר יפה נפש, כתב לעתון שהקטע בכתבה על מימון הטפול "מרגיז ומעיד על בורות". הקורא טוען שלרשות ולחמאס יש דברים חשובים יותר בתקציב המוגבל שיוצא מקופתם הצנומה.

אני גאה להחזיק בתעודת-זהות של מדינה אשר לא חוסכת מאמצים ואמצעים להציל ממוות ילד פלשתיאי, ולא אחד.

עוד על העדיפויות הפלשתינאיות -יוני דוחה הלוי

יוני דחוה הלוי, עורכו של "שלום טורונטו", הוא חוקר ומומחה בינלאומי לטרור. בתגובה לאותה כתבה שלח לי יוני את ההערות הבאות:

"המימון עבור טיפול רפואי בישראל נקלע למחלוקת בין הרשות הפלסטינית ברמאללה לבין שלטונות חמאס ללא קשר לישראל, אלא מסיבות של יריבות פלסתינאית פנימית שנפתרה לאחר זמן...האיחוד האירופי מעביר מידי שנה 500 מליון יורו לפלסתינאים כולל עזה וכסף רב נוסף מגיע מסוכנויות האו"ם ומדינות ערב. ממשלת חמאס התעשרה מנהרות עזה והיא משקיעה כספים בנדל"ן ובפרויקטים אחרים.

למרות "המצוקה הכלכלית" הרשות הפלסתינאית מעבירה מידי שנה בין 4-5% מתקציבה לסיוע לטרוריסטים המרצים עונשי מאסר בישראל ולמשפחותיהם. כולם, למעט האסירים הפליליים, זכאים לסיוע אשר גדל בהתאם למספר שנות המאסר בכלא, הווה אומר בהתאם לחומרת העבירות, ורוצח סידרתי האחראי לקטילת עשרות בפיגועי התאבדות יקבל קיצבה של אלפי ש"ח ויהיה זכאי למינו לתפקיד של מנכ"ל במשרד ממשלתי. זה סדר העדיפויות של הרשות הפלסתינאית ואין-עדיין אין-ולו מילת חרטה על הטרור". תודה ליוני.

Sukkot under the stars: vegetarian dishes for cool nights

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Sukkot is a harvest festival, so festive fall menus typically include a variety of vegetables, fruits and vegetarian main dishes. Meals are often eaten inside the sukkah, an outdoor structure with a leafy roof partly open to the sky. The sukkah symbolizes the temporary shelters in which our ancestors lived during their 40 years in the desert.

When creating a Sukkot menu for family and friends, try to choose foods that are easy to carry into and serve in your sukkah. Stuffed vegetables (cabbage, eggplant, zucchini and bell peppers) and vegetarian main dishes are often on the menu. Soups are always a popular choice – you can serve them from a large soup tureen or slow cooker. There are two tasty vegetable kugels that can be baked in advance, then cut up and served at the holiday table. Try these wonderfully delicious ways to celebrate the harvest and the holiday! Enjoy…

Shayne Train of Toronto shared her recipe for this tasty vegetarian main dish that she demonstrated at a vegetarian cooking class several years ago – it was a big hit. Shayne writes: "My husband and two kids are vegetarian (no fish either!) and the other two like meat, but this dish satisfies everyone. I usually add cheese on top, but it can be left off for a pareve meal. Sukkot is one of our favourite holidays and we serve this to company because it's warm, comfort food for a chilly evening meal out in the sukkah."

SHAYNE TRAIN'S VEGETARIAN SHEPHERD'S PIE

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 large Spanish or Vidalia onion, chopped
2 or 2 large carrots, chopped
2 cans (19 oz. each) chickpeas
2 cans (19 oz. each) kidney beans
1 can (24 oz.) thick tomato sauce (such as Hunts Thick 'n Rich)
1/2 to 1 cup water (as needed)
1 cup frozen corn, thawed (optional)
3 baking potatoes (e.g. Yukon Gold)
1/2 to 1 cup water or milk
Optional: 2 cups shredded light mozzarella cheese
Optional: sprinkle of paprika

Heat the oil in a large nonstick pot on medium heat. Add onion and sauté for 5 minutes. Stir in carrots and cook until onions are golden, about 5 minutes longer.

Drain and rinse kidney beans and chickpeas in a colander. Add to onions and carrots.

Add tomato sauce and 1/2 to 1 cup water and mix well. Reduce heat to medium-low and cook about 20 minutes longer, until beans and chickpeas are softened. Stir occasionally.

Remove pot from heat and cool mixture slightly. Use an immersion blender to grind up the mixture. Don't mix until it's smooth – leave some chunks for texture.

Stir in corn (if using) and mix well. Pour mixture into a greased 9 x 13-inch baking dish and spread evenly.

Boil potatoes until tender. (Or to microwave them, keep the skin on and peel them after cooking.) Mash potatoes with either hot water (pareve) or milk. Add liquid as needed, until the potatoes are moist and fluffy. Spread mashed potatoes on top of bean mixture. For a dairy meal, sprinkle shredded cheese on top. For pareve, sprinkle paprika on top.

Bake in a preheated 350-degree oven for 15 minutes to heat up and melt cheese, if using. If not serving right away, keep on low heat – it doesn't dry out. Yield: 8 servings.

Sylvia Kirshner of Toronto loves to serve different kinds of soups when the weather turns chilly. She often makes turkey vegetable soup or beet cabbage borscht for her family. A recent addition to her soup selection includes this heavenly harvest soup which is made with fall vegetables and aromatic spices. It's ideal for Sukkot.

Sylvia wrote: "The original recipe called for 1 pound each of butternut squash, sweet potatoes and carrots. My friend who included the sweet potatoes when she originally tried the recipe found it too sweet so we decided to eliminate them. To make up the difference, I've increased the quantity of squash and carrots to 1-1/2 pounds each. To keep the soup pareve, I make it using coconut milk rather than dairy products. This soup freezes very well but it must be reheated only on the stovetop, not in the microwave. You have to stir it while heating to bring the creaminess of the soup to the right consistency."

SYLVIA KIRSHNER'S HARVEST SOUP

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 medium onions, chopped
2 tbsp. fresh ginger, finely chopped
1 tsp. ground coriander
3/4 tsp. ground cumin
3/4 tsp. curry powder
1 1/2 lb. butternut squash, peeled, seeded and chopped
1 1/2 lb. carrots, chopped
8 cups vegetable broth or water salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 can light coconut milk (see Note)

Heat the oil in a large saucepan over medium heat. Add onion and cook about 5 minutes or until softened. Add ginger, coriander, cumin and curry powder. Cook for 1 minute. Add squash and carrots; stir well. Add stock or water and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer about 20 minutes or until vegetables are very tender.

Puree in batches using an immersion blender or electric blender until very smooth.

Return mixture to saucepan and season with salt and pepper. Whisk in coconut milk. Heat thoroughly.

Note: For a dairy version, you can make this soup with 1 cup light sour cream or yogurt and 1 cup of coconut milk. Yield: 12 servings. Recipe doubles very easily and freezes well. Reheat on the stovetop, stirring often. (Do not reheat in the microwave.)

Matthew Goodman of Brooklyn, N.Y., is the author of a wonderful collection of recipes and essays titled Jewish Food: The World at Table (HarperCollins Publishers). In his introduction to kugels in his culinary treasure that celebrates the ingenuity of Jewish cooks around the world, Goodman writes: "There are just about as many types of kugel as there are ingredients that can be cut up, mixed and baked… Just as latkes can be made with many vegetables other than potatoes, so too can kugels stretch well beyond the typical potato and noodle varieties. This carrot kugel is sweet, moist and surprisingly light, a lovely accompaniment for beef or chicken."

MATTHEW GOODMAN'S CARROT KUGEL

2 lb. carrots, peeled and grated
1/3 cup lightly packed brown sugar
4 tbsp. butter, melted and cooled (or 4 tbsp. vegetable oil)
3 eggs, lightly beaten
1/2 cup matzah meal
1/4 tsp. vanilla extract
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. salt

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease a 9-inch square glass baking dish.

Place all of the ingredients in a large bowl and stir until fully combined. Pour the mixture into the prepared baking dish and smooth the top. Bake until the kugel is well-browned on top, about 55 minutes. Let cool for 10 minutes. Serve warm. Serves 6 as a side dish.

Robbins Hebrew Academy – Architects of a new day school model

At Robbins Hebrew Academy, we are the architects of our future, and a leader in the education of Jewish children, with a program designed for 21st century learning. Through the creation of our new school model with critical thinking as its foundation, RHA is poised to be the first Jewish day school in Toronto to apply to be a candidate school for accreditation by SEAL (Standards in Excellence & Learning.)

SEAL is an association for independent and private schools that focuses on developing and promoting educational excellence, school improvement and leadership. SEAL is a proud member of the Association of Accrediting Agencies of Canada and is accredited by the National Association of Independent Schools. RHA's Head of School, Claire Sumerlus, has been on the SEAL board for many years and brings her experience to this process.

RHA began the process by creating the vision of our mission: the ideal "relationships" needed for 21st century graduates. As critical thinking is foundational to the RHA vision, the curriculum at first was designed to honour this vision and make achievement of critical thinking more likely. Teachers began by building their understanding of "critical challenges" to determine what success looked like.

"We have embarked on a process of continuous school improvement in order to provide the best education in both General and Judaic Studies," said Ms. Sumerlus. "This process is inclusive and supports all types of learners, as we believe a Jewish education is important for all."

As "architects" Ms. Sumerlus has now created the detailed documents or "blueprints" that describe the richness of our curriculum. These documents are created to align with the SEAL accreditation process. To achieve these standards, RHA has delineated the best practices in teaching and learning to ensure the integration, scope, sequence and continuity of the program. "We used Schooling by Design (Grant Wiggins, 2007), Five Minds of the Future (Howard Gardner, 2007), The Global Achievement Gap (Tony Wagner, 2008), and other educational research sources to support the curriculum portion of our strategic plan that is being designed to achieve the school's mission," said Ms. Sumerlus.

Robbins Hebrew Academy students are fortunate to be on the leading edge of education with their LEARNING POWER.

Shabbaton for families of kidswith special needs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Six agencies have been working for more than a year to organize an upcoming Shabbaton for children and young adults with special needs, and their families.

The Shabbaton – under the auspices of DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence); the Friendship Circle (affiliated with Chabad); Jewish Family & Child; Reena; Yachad, the National Jewish Council for Disabilities; and Zareinu – will take place at the Salvation Army Camp at Jackson's Point, an hour north of Toronto, from Oct. 8 to 10.

"We felt that it's really important for our families to have the opportunity to get together and to have a Shabbos experience together," said Arlene Margolese, Reena's manager of faith and cultural services, and of volunteer services.

"We have people from every denomination," she said. "The idea is that they will have a spiritual experience, and the opportunity to get together and relax... We felt the families would enjoy the opportunity to experience the warmth of Shabbat."

The facility is wheelchair accessible and can accommodate up to 100 people, said Susie Sokol, co-founder of DANI.

Both Margolese and Sokol described the venue with superlatives: amazing and fabulous. "Everything is well kept," said Margolese, "and the grounds are gorgeous."

To the best of their knowledge, the weekend is the first of its kind in Canada. Yachad has been running them in New York, however, for more than 20 years, said Galya Ouanounou, Yachad's program director in Toronto.

"It's an unbelievable experience," she said of the New York Shabbaton that she attended. "Parents told me they're not even involved with Yachad, but this is the one event they go to. It gives them so much support and knowledge... Everyone comes from different backgrounds. Their children are all different. I think they learn to appreciate their situation, and feel that they're not alone."

The weekend will include kosher meals and services, and programming for the children, as well as for their siblings.

A Saturday night program will feature live music and pizza for the kids, while parents will address the topic, "Ya gotta have a sense of humour!" over a marshmallow roast.

The cost of the weekend – which is subsidized through a grant from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto – is $75 per person.

For further information or to register, email torontoyachad@ou.org or call 647-889-7164.

LIFESTYLE ADVERTORIAL

IT'S 11AM. Do you know where your mother is?

For adult children whose aging parents depend on them for daily assistance with tasks such as transportation, shopping and even cooking and housekeeping, a vacation becomes the impossible dream. The availability of short term "vacation" stays in a retirement residence, however, make a vacation possible.

Many seniors, even if they are living in their own homes, are supported by family members who call or visit daily. Often lonely and at risk of falls, medication errors or other mishaps, some older adults rely heavily on their families to ensure they are safe, well-fed, properly medicated and connecting with other people daily. Adult daughters, the most likely providers of these loving services, can easily devote 20 or more hours weekly to the care of a parent – and the stress and worry is significant.

If anyone ever deserved a vacation, it is these overworked, stressed daughters. Previously unable to travel due to their relentless commitment to a parent, adult children can now give both mom and themselves a break through the Vacation Getaway program at Kensington Place Retirement Residence.

"It works like a charm," says Kensington Place General Manager Michael Ayers. "The parent comes for a mini-vacation with us. We treat her like royalty – beautiful accommodations, lovely kosher meals and a busy recreation program. I've seen wonderful friendships happen and the parent blossom like they haven't in years. In the meantime, the daughter is off getting her much-needed break."

Vacations at Kensington Place can be booked by calling Lisa Ludmer, Marketing Director at (416) 636-9555.

Turkey to meet Ahmadinejad instead of Peres

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Turkish President Abdullah Gul said Monday that he would no longer be able to meet with President Shimon Peres on the sidelines of a United Nations General Assembly meeting in New York, citing time constraints.

Gul will meet with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, however. Gul told reporters in New York that he expected the international row over Tehran's contentious nuclear program to top the agenda for many at the conference.

The Turkish newspaper Today's Zaman reported last Friday that Gul and Peres would hold talks, the first of its kind between the two countries' high-level government representatives since the Israeli raid on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla in May, during which nine Turkish nationals were killed.

Although Gul would not say that he had decided not to meet Peres due to tensions over the raid, he did tell Turkey's official Anatolia news agency: "We will not forgive Israel for those killed in the Israeli attack on the aid flotilla, even if Israel apologizes."

Last week, Today's Zaman quoted an unnamed official as saying that Gul had intended to tell Peres that relations between the two countries won't be normalized until Israel apologizes for the flotilla raid and pays monetary compensation to the families of those killed during the ensuing clashes.

Israeli Foreign Ministry officials said in June that Israel would not apologize to Turkey over the raid and that the demand for an official apology was mainly an excuse to allow Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan to cut diplomatic ties with Israel.

Turkey recalled their ambassador to Israel after the raid and has said it will not send an ambassador back unless Israel apologizes for the raid and pays the requested compensation. They have also threatened to impose sanctions against Israel.

Though there are no reports of a forthcoming apology from Israel, Gul reportedly said that "foreign ministers can meet with others from the enemy country even in the battlefield."

Turkey and Israel's escalated tensions have been eased several times, including a meeting between Industry, Trade and Labor Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu in late June.

Though the contents of the meeting were not disclosed, Ben-Eliezer reiterated the Israeli stance that there will be no apology for the raid because the Israel Navy acted lawfully.

In a separate incident on Monday, an envelope containing suspicious white powder was sent to the Turkish embassy in Tel Aviv. The powder was sent to a lab in Nes Tziona for inspection.

Sale of land to Israelis ruled punishable by death

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — The sale of Palestinian land to Israelis is punishable by death, a Palestinian Authority court ruled on Sunday in what Palestinian officials are saying is a necessary measure to ensure the founding of a future state.

Judge Ta'et At-Twil, according to a report by the Palestinian news agency Ma'an, ruled that selling, or attempting to sell, land to a foreign country was a criminal offence that could result in the death penalty.

In a statement released after the ruling, the Palestine General Prosecution said the move represented "a consolidation of the previous legal principle," adding that the "ruling aimed to protect the Palestinian national project to establish an independent Palestinian state."

Last year, a Palestinian military court sentenced a man to death by hanging for selling land to an Israeli company, with the prosecutor at the time saying that the defendant had sold land that didn't belong to him in the village of Beit Ummar using forged documents.

Land sales are considered treason by the Palestinians because of their long-running dispute with the Israelis, however the sentence is unlikely to be implemented.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas routinely withholds the required approval for executions. Several others are on death row as suspected informants for Israel.

Ovadia Yosef atones to Mubarak after declaring Palestinians should die

By YAIR ETTINGER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Three weeks after making hostile statements about the Palestinians, Shas spiritual leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef is sending out a conciliatory message and is returning to his old positions in support of the peace process.

Yosef expressed support for the direct talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority and wished "longevity" to the Arab leaders who are partners in the process.

"My position has been known and clear for decades, on the importance of achieving peace while preserving the security of the nation of Israel," the rabbi wrote in a letter to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

"We wish for sustainable peace with all our neighbours and we are very thankful to the honourable president for his direct involvement in the peace process in our region, which undoubtedly contributes and strengthens this important process," the letter continued.

Yosef wrote the letter to Mubarak, which was then sent from the bureau of President Shimon Peres to Cairo, translated into Arabic. He addressed Mubarak as "our esteemed and dear friend."

Peres offered the rabbi assistance in the initiative in an effort to improve the atmosphere created by statements made by the rabbi during a sermon three weeks ago.

"Let our enemies and those who hate us die," Yosef said then. "[PA President Abbas] and all these evil people should perish from this world. God should strike them with a plague, them and these Palestinians."

The statements were strongly condemned in Egypt and around the world.

Sources in the rabbi's home told Ha'aretz that since the statements were made, the rabbi "was very sorry" and looked for a way of sending a conciliatory message to the Palestinians.

"I support your efforts and praise all the leaders and the peoples – Egyptians, Jordanians and Palestinians – who are partners and wish the success of this important process of achieving peace in our region, and preventing bloodshed. May God grant you longevity and may you succeed in your efforts for peace and may there be peace in our region," Yosef wrote.

Israel Briefs

Talks were 'tough'

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas discussed "tough issues" at their meeting in Jerusalem, George Mitchell said. "They are tackling up front the issues that are at the centre of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," Mitchell, the U.S. Mideast envoy, told reporters following the meeting, the third between the two leaders in two days. "I will say that the two leaders are not leaving the tough issues to the end of their discussions. We take this as a strong indicator of their belief that peace is possible." Abbas travelled from Ramallah in the West Bank to Jerusalem on Sept. 15 for direct talks with Netanyahu at his official residence. They met first with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton and Mitchell.

Talks were held Sept. 14 in the Egyptian resort Sharm el-Sheik.

Havel joins Israel-friendly initiative

Israeli media reported that former Czech President Vaclav Havel joined an initiative to defend Israel in Europe and the West. The Friends of Israel announced the participation of Havel, a champion of human rights, during the group's inaugural Washington tour. Havel was not on the tour. Other former leaders on the initiative, founded in June, include Jose Maria Aznar, the former Spanish prime minister; David Trimble, the former Protestant leader in Northern Ireland and Nobel Peace laureate; and Alejandro Toledo, the former president of Peru. Havel, a playwright, was a hero of the left and right in the West during his decades of dissidence against Communist rule in the former Czechoslovakia.

In an address to the Council on Foreign Relations, Aznar said: "Defending Israel is ultimately defending our Western roots, the Western values that many in Europe, and some in America, seem to have forgotten."

Google eyes second Israeli start-up

Google reportedly will acquire a second Israeli start-up company. The Israeli business daily Globes reported that Google is paying "several million dollars" to purchase Quiksee, also known as MentorWave Technologies. Other reports put the purchase price at $10 million, though neither Google nor Quiksee has responded to the reports. The company's software reportedly enhanced Google's Street View feature by turning the video clip of a location uploaded to Google Maps into a virtual tour and an interactive experience, according to Globes. The Or Yehuda-based Quiksee was founded in 2002.

EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR

בית צדק
Beth Tzedec Congregation

Our client, Beth Tzedec Congregation of Toronto, is seeking an Executive Director who will successfully oversee the operational management of the Synagogue. Beth Tzedec is one of North America's largest and preeminent Conservative Synagogues. Founded in 1952, Beth Tzedec has a membership comprised of over 2500 families and continues to provide a myriad of programs and services to meet the evolving needs of its members.

Reporting directly to the President and working collaboratively with the Clergy, Senior Staff, Board of Governors and its Committees, this is a rare opportunity for an exceptional executive who brings 10-15+ years of senior operational, financial and leadership experience gained from working with multifaceted, client service focused organizations within the not-for-profit and/or private sector. The new Executive Director will contribute to and implement the new strategic vision of the Synagogue, will nurture and develop critical internal and external relationships, and will be responsible for the management and supervision of: the Staff and the overall functioning of the organization, program development, membership recruitment and retention, marketing and communications, maintenance of all facilities and operations, as well as overseeing capital campaigns and building programs. In addition, he/she will motivate and mobilize the Volunteers and Lay Leaders.

Critical to the success of the Executive Director will be his/her ability to quickly establish trust and credibility with the Clergy, Staff, Board of Governors, Lay Leaders, Volunteers and Members through his/her approachable, trustworthy and transparent leadership style, demonstrated business and operational judgment and ability to engage, inspire and challenge the Synagogue to perform to the best of its capability. The ideal candidate will bring a proven track record of developing high performance teams and programs and a passion for Beth Tzedec and the community it proudly serves.

Missiles expected to get to Hezbollah

Last month, Ha'aretz reported that Netanyahu had tried to sway his Russian counterpart, Prime Minister Vladimir Putin, from completing the deal, reportedly saying the missiles could be transferred to Hezbollah and used against Israel Defence Forces troops, as was the case in the Second Lebanon War.

Speaking Friday, Serdyukov said that "the issue of selling the missiles to Syria was raised during the talks with U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates… Undoubtedly, it [the contract] would be fulfilled by the Russian side."

Responding to the Ha'aretz report last month, Sergei Prikhodko, a senior adviser to Russian President Dmitry Medvedev, told RIA Novosti that Moscow would fulfil all agreements it had made with foreign countries and would not halt the deal.

"Lately, some Israeli media outlets have been actively disseminating information distorting Russia's position on the implementation of its obligations to Syria, including in the sphere of military and technical co-operation," Prikhodko said. "I would like to stress that the Russian Federation honours all the agreements that were previously signed between Russia and Syria."

In his talks with Putin last month, Netanyahu stressed Syria's transfer of advanced Russian anti-tank missiles to Hezbollah during the 2006 war, also mentioning the incident in which Syrian-acquired Chinese-made C-802 anti-shipping missiles were used by Hezbollah to target an Israeli destroyer.

Earlier this month, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak made another reported attempt to stop the planned arms deal in conversations with both Putin and Serdyukov during his official visit to Russia.

Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert

U.S. offered to take 100,000 Palestinians: Olmert

JTA

JERUSALEM — The administration of former U.S. president George W. Bush offered to absorb 100,000 Palestinian refugees if Israel and the Palestinians reached a peace deal, Ehud Olmert said.

The former Israeli prime minister, speaking to the Geneva Initiative conference in Tel Aviv Sunday night, said that Israel had also agreed to absorb a symbolic amount of Palestinian refugees, a number he said to be fewer than 20,000.

Olmert said he had made the offer to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas during negotiations in 2008 as a resolution of the refugee problem, in line with the Arab League peace plan.

"If we had reached an agreement, it would have changed the map of the world and the entire Middle East. We are not to blame. If there is no agreement, it's because the Palestinian side was not prepared to take the extra step that we made," Olmert said.

He said that any resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict must be based on the 1967 borders. He said the offer he made to Abbas also included giving control over Jerusalem's "holy basin," which includes the Old City, to a grouping of five countries.

Olmert said that the Obama administration is not hostile against Israel. "There is no difference between Bush's positions and Obama's positions," he asserted.

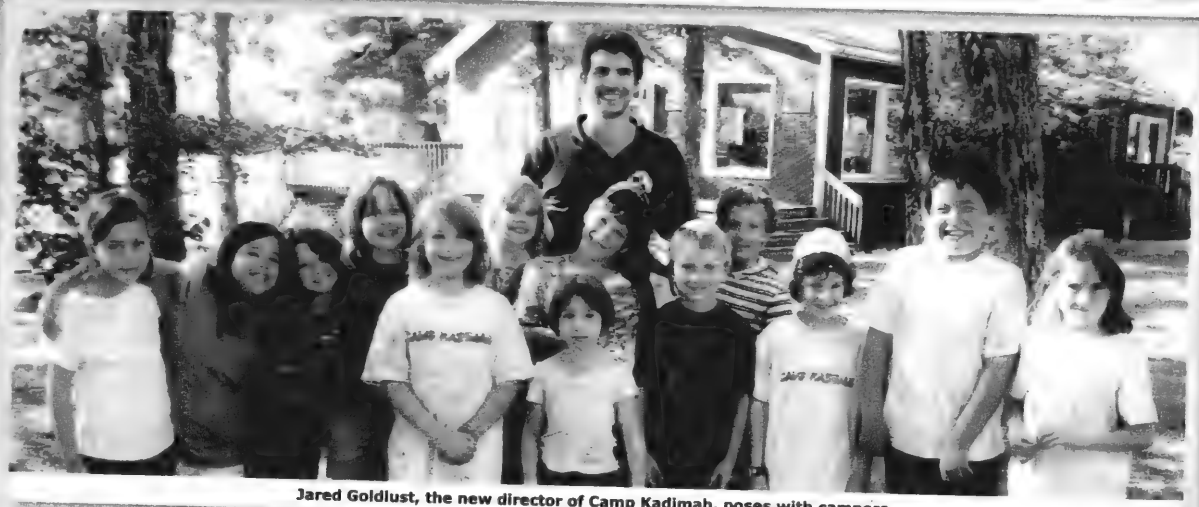
Brandeis graduate new camp director at Kadimah



Jared Goldlust, the new director of Camp Kadimah, poses with campers.

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

When Jared Goldlust was nine years old, he didn't like camp very much.

"My first camp experience, I went to Northland B'nai Brith," he said. "I was a very homesick child. My mom still has the letters. I really wanted to go home every minute."

Then, at 13, he went to Camp Kadimah, in Nova Scotia, and everything changed.

"When I got to Kadimah, I realized the staff members were on the lookout for me. They wanted to spend their summers with the kids," said Goldlust.

And now, at 25, he'll be continuing that pattern. Goldlust is the second person to receive the Robert and Elisa Spungen Bildner Fellowship, awarded by the Foundation for Jewish Camp to help foster the future of Jewish camping. The fellowship, or scholarship, allowed Goldlust to get a dual master's and MBA degree in Jewish professional leadership at Brandeis' Heller School for Social Policy and Management and at the Hornstein Jewish Professional Leadership Program at Brandeis, where the Torontonian specialized in Jewish camping.

Receiving the fellowship was, for Goldlust, "an incredible opportunity. I knew I couldn't pass it up."

He received his bachelor's degree in recreation management at Dalhousie University before attending Brandeis, where he learned about the broader Jewish community.

"I always cared a lot about the Jewish community, but I never really delved into how it operated and organized itself," he said.

"I loved sitting in class [at Brandeis] and talking about how the Jewish community is engaging Jews around North America."

For Goldlust, Jewish camping was never just a past time.

The graduate spent several years as a counsellor at Camp Kadimah before taking over for the director while she was on maternity leave. Now, after graduating from Brandeis, he'll be the permanent director of Camp Kadimah. He'll spend some time in its new Toronto office while he gets ready for next summer.

"When I was all done school... I realized camp is the place I love," he said. "Most people [working] at camp have a mindset of, 'When am I going to move into the real world?' But I had the realization that camp could be the real world."

Even as a camper, Goldlust knew that camp was more than just a place to socialize.

"I was forced at times to go outside my comfort zones and encouraged, whether it's speaking in front of a large group, running a station during an evening program," he said. "I knew right away that I wanted to be a counsellor at Camp Kadimah. One big part of it is giving back to the place that gave to you."

For Eve Rudin, the director of camp excellence and advancement at the Federation of Jewish Camping, an organization that supports Jewish camping throughout North America, Goldlust was a natural candidate for the fellowship, which included a stipend as well as the initial scholarship.

"He received [the fellowship] in 2008. We were looking for someone who had a commitment to an experience in Jewish summer camp. Someone who desires to make that their profession in their career. Someone who has leadership qualities, charisma and was also going to be able to withstand the program," she said. "Jared stood out. He has very strong leadership qualities... I would say [we liked] his energy, his enthusiasm and commitment to the field."

For Rudin, the fellowship is an important step in fostering Jewish camping.

"Jewish summer camps... are the most effective way to build a Jewish identity for the future," said Rudin. "It's an immersive environment, where [campers and staff] can experience Jewish living. Every moment of camp is an opportunity for making it a Jewish experience."

Goldlust agrees. To the new director, Kadimah's camp ground is the ideal setting for creating a Jewish identity.

"What goes on at camp is the informal, fun element of being Jewish. It's the experience and socialization that's done in such a unique way at camp that's so very different than formal schools," he said.

"Camp creates an environment where... [campers] develop a strong sense of pride and Jewish identity, especially when they have Jewish role models who aren't much older than them."

Goldlust plans to enhance this at Kadimah in his new role.

"I have high hopes for this place... For me, moving forward is, 'How do I continue to develop our programs and people here so that we have an amazing summer camp?'" he said, adding that he'll be concentrating on forging connections in the new Toronto office, since many campers come from the city.

Michael Pink, the co-chairman of Camp Kadimah, is confident Goldlust will succeed.

"I've known Jared probably for the last five to seven years. I've watched him as a staff member move into more and more senior positions," he said.

"He'd make a great director because he knows and understands the Kadimah culture... he has the right mix of personality and academic background and maturity to run a summer camp."

A new 'sound' for Buster Keaton

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Toronto pianist and singer Fern Lindzon is participating in a unique project being put on by the Toronto International Film Festival.

"I was commissioned by TIFF to write a score for a Buster Keaton movie," she says. The score will be performed live when the silent movie, Sherlock Jr., is screened at the Bell Lighthouse Theatre on Sept. 26.

"They were probably looking for something a little bit out of the ordinary," she says, and they wanted a klezmer flavour. "The film works very well with a klezmer groove."

Fern Lindzon

Lindzon will be joined on stage with five other musicians who will perform as the movie is played on the screen above them. "Hopefully, high enough so when I raise my arms, people won't see my underarms," she jokes.

Lindzon has never written a film score before, and worked on it for a couple of months. "I've probably seen some scenes a couple of hundred times, especially those scenes where the timing is split-second."

She says the score is not exclusively klezmer, but will include free improvisation and jazz.

The movie, which is ranked 62nd in the American Film Institute's list of funny films, is on TIFF's 100 Essential Films list. It features nutty chase scenes, bad guys, slapstick and a crazy dream sequence with astonishing editing.

"It's amazing what they could do in 1922 with scissors and tape," Lindzon says.

The free event is part of the city of Toronto's Culture Days, and it will be performed four times on Sept. 26 at 11 a.m., 12:30 p.m., 2 p.m. and 3:30 p.m. The Bell Lightbox Theatre is at Reitman Square at the corner of King and John streets, Toronto.

Yearning for love in The Matchmaker

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Avi Nesher's coming-of-age film, The Matchmaker, brims with the yearning for romance and love, the pain and loss of the Holocaust and the wonderment of adolescence.

These deep-seated, roiling human emotions play out in the Israeli port city of Haifa in the summer of 1968, when Arik (Tuval Shafir), a 16-year-old curious teen, finds a job with Yankele Bride (Adir Miller), a reclusive matchmaker and Holocaust survivor.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival, The Matchmaker opens as Hezbollah rockets rain down on Haifa during the tumult of the Second Lebanon War in 2006.

As the jagged blare of an ambulance siren fills the air, Arik learns he has come into a substantial inheritance from the man who once employed him.

The film then flashes back 38 years, to the time Arik procured potential clients for Yankele, a mysterious, persistent and kind-hearted matchmaker and occasional smuggler who works out of a bakery near the seedy waterfront and whose mission in life is to match up lonely souls.

Dedicated to matching up people who seek "real love" as opposed to "hanky-panky," Yankele recruits Arik after he and his naughty friends try to deceive him in a juvenile practical joke. Their deception leads Yankele to Arik's father, an old, lost friend from prewar Romania.

Plunging into his work with zeal, determination and curiosity, Arik discovers a world far removed from his own experiences as he meets an assortment of unusual characters.

They include Clara (Maya Dagan), an attractive but fragile Holocaust survivor whom Yankele desires and who runs an illegal gambling den in her apartment; Sylvia (Bat-El Papura), the owner of a movie theatre who was subjected to Nazi medical experiments and who now hungers for a husband, and Meir (Dror Kenen), a socially awkward librarian who also has an eye on Clara.

Not surprisingly, Arik is hardly immune to the call of love. He falls for Tamara (Neta Porat), a demure young woman who looks especially striking in a bathing suit.

Boldly imaginative in conception and execution, The Matchmaker largely unfolds in what Yankele accurately describes as Haifa's "low-rent" district, a somewhat shabby, but colourful, neighbourhood dotted with bars and theatres and inhabited by new Jewish immigrants, Israeli Arabs and prostitutes.

Adir Miller, right, and Tuval Shafir in The Matchmaker.

Nesher, an able director who has a knack for creating a mood of plausibility in his movies, extracts credible performances from the cast.

Miller projects an air of mystery, while Dagan exudes personal tragedy Papura radiates sadness and desperation and Kenen emits both vulnerability and calculation.

Shafir, who carries much of the film on his young shoulders, turns in a remarkably mature performance.

The Matchmaker, which is 118 minutes in length, is a fine, sensitively made film about broken people from the old world trying to mend themselves in a new land.

The Debt, a thriller, jangles the nerves

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

After all the foreign intrigue, fisticuffs and bang-bang, The Debt is a good old-fashioned morality tale.

A Hollywood staple, in other words.

Screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last week and adapted from an eponymous Israeli movie, The Debt is a political thriller turning on vengeance and justice and set in Israel, Germany and Ukraine over a 30-year period.

Shifting easily between the 1960s and 1990s, John Madden's picture is ostensibly about a Mossad team tasked with the mission of capturing a Nazi war criminal, known as the Surgeon of Treblinka, in his lair in East Berlin.

Subliminally, however, The Debt addresses an important philosophical issue: How important is truth compared to country? This is the question that permeates the film, which stars the accomplished British actress Helen Mirren as Rachel Singer, one of the Mossad agents.

Unfolding to Thomas Newman's alternately pulsating and eerie musical score, The Debt opens at an airport in Israel in the mid-1960s as the three members of the Mossad team disembark from the belly of an airplane to a hero's welcome.

The young Rachel (Jessica Chastain), David (Sam Worthington) and Stefan (Marton Csokas) have just completed their mission with astonishing success.

The film fast-forwards to Tel Aviv, circa 1997, as the older Rachel (Mirren) attends a glittering book launching party. Written by her daughter Sarah (Romi Aboulafia), it celebrates her mother's central role in the capture of Dieter Vogel, a German physician accused of carrying out gruesome, inhumane medical experiments on Jews in the Treblinka death camp.

At this point, The Debt seamlessly fades back to 1965. Arriving in East Berlin, Rachel links up with the blustery Stefan and the reclusive David. She studies horrific photographs of the Holocaust, while she and Stefan practise hand-to-hand combat.

Vogel (Jesper Christensen), the object of their mission, works in a fertility clinic. Rachel visits him in the guise of a patient. As he examines her, he contemptuously refers to a Jewish colleague as an "old Jew," thereby confirming his ingrained anti-Semitism.

Having established Vogel's whereabouts, the Mossad squad hatches a daring scheme to apprehend him. But the plan goes awry and the agents are forced to watch over Vogel in a safe house until he can be flown to Israel to stand trial.

These scenes, shot in a grimy flat and a dark railway station, add to the mounting tension.

No pushover, Vogel refuses to co-operate. He initially refuses to eat and plays malicious mind games with them. While professing to admire the attachment of Jews to their roots, he spits out a series of taunts: Jews only know how to die and have no right to live. Rachel and her co-agents must exercise enormous self-restraint in the face of these gratuitous insults.

Much to their anger and embarrassment, Vogel manages to escape. Concocting a lie for the consumption of their superiors in Jerusalem, since failure is not an option, the agents return to Israel, covered in glory.

But three decades later, the case is reopened when a man in Kiev claims to be Vogel. Stefan (Tom Wilkinson), now a senior official in the Mossad, orders Rachel to finish the job. She reluctantly agrees, haunted by the spectre of her failure to capture Vogel in the first place.

As she homes in on her quarry, Rachel is torn by the moral qualm that her false cover story unjustly transformed her into a heroine. With ease, Mirren conveys the range of Rachel's emotions.

The Debt, cleanly and efficiently directed by Madden, works on two different levels. As a thriller, it jangles the nerves nicely. As a morality tale, it is suitably thought-provoking.

Israel's 'Elton John' makes his Toronto debut

Rami Kleinstein

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

TEL AVIV — Israel's "Elton John," pianist, singer and composer Rami Kleinstein, performs in Toronto for the first time next month.

Kleinstein, 48, brings his Intimate Piano Performance tour to the city's Glenn Gould Studio on Oct. 2, after stops in Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles and Kansas City.

"I'm really looking forward to it," says Kleinstein over espresso and cigarettes at the Idelson Café near the Tel Aviv port, where he moved recently. "I was in Toronto as a kid, but I never performed there."

The pop/soft rock legend says he thrives on playing for new audiences. "I think about it like going out on a date," he says. "It's much like courting. I charm the audience, and they charm me back. It's a give-and-take thing."

He gets particular joy from charming audiences in North America. "For me, I feel I have a special responsibility when I play shows in North America, like I'm extending a cultural arm, bringing a taste of Israeli culture."

Kleinstein was born in New York and moved to Israel when he was eight. His love affair with music started even before then. Recalls Kleinstein, he visited Israel for a year with his family before making the big move, and they had a neighbour with a piano. Even before he took lessons, he could play almost anything by ear. "That's why I say I didn't really choose the piano, the piano chose me," he says.

Musical talent is something that runs in the Kleinstein clan. Kleinstein's grandfather, from Latvia, played the balalaika in a band that travelled to Lebanon and Egypt to play for British camps in the 1920s and 30s. Kleinstein's father, a scientist, studied the clarinet, and his mother, the violin. Both of Kleinstein's daughters, Meshi, 18, and Noam, 9, are musically inclined, and this year Meshi was drafted to sing in an Israel Defence Forces entertainment group. "There is DNA," says Kleinstein.

Of course, the lessons didn't hurt. Kleinstein studied classical music with Israel's famous instructors, the Barenboims (Daniel Barenboim is a conductor), until he joined the army in 1980 and became director of the military band IDF 80. In 1985, he produced his first song, Your Wonder Has Yet to Be Done. The release of his first album in 1986, The Day of the Bomb, put both him and his ex-wife, Rita, one of Israel's superstar singers, on the map.

Since then, Kleinstein has released 10 albums, three of which went triple platinum and one of which went gold. He has produced live shows and albums for top Israeli musicians, including Gidi Gov, Yehudit Ravitz and Danny Bassan. He has even written a movie soundtrack. In 1995, he was named Israel Radio and Television's Singer of the Year on the release of his most famous album, Apples and Dates, and just this summer, A Star Is Born, the Israeli version of American Idol, did a retrospective dedicated to him and his work.

Although Kleinstein is an Israeli musician through and through, he says if you listen closely to his music you can hear the strong North American influence. He says his primary influences were Anglos – Bruce Springsteen, the Beatles, Paul Simon and James Taylor, to name a few.

"[My Israeli contemporaries] grew up on stuff that I didn't," he says. "When you hear my music, you can hear the orientation of an American."

Kleinstein takes this as part and parcel of being an immigrant. "There will always be a part of me that's missing here, in a sense," he says. "But as much as I have changed the Israeli music scene with my art, the Israeli music scene has had its influence on me. In the end, it's a fusion."

Recently, Kleinstein has been gripped by newfound inspiration. Ever since his divorce three years ago, he has been a fount of creative output. "After the separation, it took me time to find my own motion. I think I have found it now. I am at a very, very creative stage in my life right now," he says. "I am much more creative and focused than I have ever been. I am just bursting with creativity."

Part of this, he attributes to living in central Tel Aviv. "I think it's probably one of the most special cities in the world," he says. "I feel all this noise and motion, the vibe here, really working for me."

In addition to his piano-man concert circuit, he has his own band, the Council, and has been playing shows with all kinds of musicians – big bands, small bands, single acts – as well as producing concerts for other musicians and collaborating with artists and lyricists, among them Daniel Salomon, Danny Sanderson, Tamir Harpaz, and Yair Lapid. He also released a new double album this year, Rami Kleinstein Live, with three new songs.

These days, he aims to release a new song every few months. "It's really important for me to keep on pushing new stuff," he says. Kleinstein says this is the future of the music industry. "Music has evolved with computers and the Internet and Napster and iTunes, and albums with 12 songs are not as appealing to audiences as they once were. People don't buy albums, they buy songs."

That's not to say there is no room on the market for albums anymore, but the concept of the album has changed, and must really tell a story. Kleinstein recently commenced work on a compilation album of nostalgic songs from childhood. "This is a special project, a special playlist," he says.

Kleinstein comes to Toronto courtesy of Motek Productions, which has brought other Israeli entertainers to the city, including Berry Sakharof and the Idan Raichel Project.

For tickets ($35-95) to Kleinstein's Toronto show, call 647-899-0071 or visit www.motekproductions.com. Includes an open bar and appetizers at 8 p.m. and opening act, mentalist Haim Goldenberg, at 9:15 p.m.

Darkness at the edge of town

It was for the best that Jonathan Franzen angered Oprah Winfrey, following her announcement that his novel The Corrections would be part of her program's Book Club. The resulting publicity surrounding his being disinvited from the show didn't hurt the novel's sales, and there was likely little the two could have discussed to any useful end.

Though Franzen is affable and thoughtful in his meetings with media figures, his fictional portraits of America are dark – they buzz with smart, ironic characters who find it impossible to be at ease – in a way that is at odds with Winfrey's goal of sunny uplift. As young Americans at the top of their field, Franzen and Winfrey might be said to offer uniquely contrary views of their country's successes and failures.

Franzen's new novel, Freedom (HarperCollins Canada), is as an examination of American verities, ideals and desires. Set in part in Minnesota in the middle years of this decade, it is not entirely removed from the calamity of Sept. 11, 2001. But it is more directly focused on contemporary environmental idealism and the apocalyptic fears that can drive such ideals.

The bravura early chapters of Freedom take place in St. Paul, Minn., and so, tell a story about a place and time that is fresh with particularity and exoticism for readers who live in or know American locales more readily found in fiction. The writer who haunts these sections is F. Scott Fitzgerald, who was himself from St. Paul, and whose masterful, lyrical critique of the American dream, The Great Gatsby, is one of the books readers might want to reach for upon finishing Freedom.

In interviews, Franzen repeats his desire to create popular narratives with characters and plot lines that grab readers through their sheer energy. In this, he succeeds in Freedom, with its detailed portrait of Walter and Patty Berglund, who stand as representative figures of their age. In his satiric portrait of Patty, Franzen confronts the idealism as well as the materialism and attendant emptiness that he sees at the core of his generation's middle-class ideals. Here, it is Philip Roth's American Pastoral that seems to underwrite the family romance that tears the Berglunds apart. Franzen shares Roth's fascination with the way that parents, meaning well but doing worse, create private disasters they cannot escape.

This aspect of Freedom may feel corrosive, or at least provocative to readers who hope that a child and a parent can share a straightforward, uncompromised friendship. Such things evade the Berglunds and most everyone else they come into contact with. It is from such difficulties between smart, self-conscious, often enervated characters that much of the novel's narrative energy comes.

One of Franzen's key differences from a writer like Roth is his disinterest in fixing his narrative in relation to a single community. Themes associated with Jewish American life have a strange and haunting presence in the novel, but Franzen is interested in "America" in the broadest terms, letting his narrative shift from the Midwest, to New York City and farther south to catch the broadest exemplary range of American social and private life.

In the novel's bigness (576 pages) – its length and reach and detail – it is reminiscent of the most challenging work by Don DeLillo, whose astringent, bleakly funny style lurks beneath the surface of Franzen's prose. And it is DeLillo's epic novel, Underground, which sets the tone for Franzen's discomforting portrayal of post-Sept. 11 New York: "Then came a freezing Thursday afternoon, a sky of uniform greyness, a light snow that made the downtown skyline's negative space less negative, blurring the Woolworth building and its fairy-tale turrets, gently slanting in the weather's tensors down the Hudson and out into the dark Atlantic..."

Reviews of Freedom have characterized it as a key novel for our time. Its dialogue with masterpieces such as The Great Gatsby, American Pastoral and Underground place it in an influential line of American self-examination begun almost a century ago. When you've got a good conversation going with such illustrious counterparts, you don't need Oprah's Book Club to get the word out.

Norman Ravvin's new novel is The Joyful Child, from Gaspereau Press. He is Chair of the Concordia Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Israel, Canada to share work on F-35 fighters

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canada and Israel experienced a brief frisson of diplomatic tension late last month when military technology developer Lockheed Martin granted Israel a lucrative maintenance contract on the development of its new F-35 Lightning II – a.k.a. the Joint Strike Fighter (JSF) aircraft – despite not having invested in production of the warplane.

Canada and other NATO allies, such as Denmark, Italy and Britain, had all previously committed funds to develop the stealth fighter in order to secure domestic industrial contracts on the fighter.

In early August, Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak and Defence Ministry Director General Udi Shani visited the United States and met with senior officials in the Pentagon, as well as representatives of Lockheed Martin, to discuss Israel's role in the maintenance contract and purchase of the aircraft.

They agreed that Israel would buy an initial squadron of 20 F-35 jets – at a total cost of $2.75 billion (US) – from the first production series and would only install a few Israel-made systems.

The Americans, meanwhile, agreed that if Israel buys more F-35 squadrons from later production series of the aircraft, the installation of more Israeli-made systems would be allowed. Israel has expressed its desire to eventually purchase 75 planes in total.

To sweeten the deal, Lockheed Martin said it would buy parts and systems for the F-35 from Israeli companies at a cost of $4 billion.

It's this latter incentive that had some Canadian military and industry officials asking why Lockheed Martin would offer such a deal to Israel, but the government shrugged off suggestions of any ill will toward the deal.

Jay Paxton, a spokesperson for the Department of National Defence, told The CJN that Canada "welcomed" Israel's purchase of the jets.

"The government of Israel recently signed an industrial participation plan with Lockheed Martin to facilitate Israeli participation in the JSF program. The plan is… similar to the one Canada signed with Lockheed Martin in 2006," he wrote in an e-mail.

Paxton added that Canada will also receive "a decrease" in the price of its jets as a result of Israel's acquisition.

"As well, Canadian industry will reap millions in additional contracts building parts for Israeli jets," he added.

In a Sept. 10 report in the Vancouver Sun, Defence Minister Peter Mackay said Canada has contributed nearly $170 million to develop the F-35 and that Canadian firms have already been awarded close to $300 million in contracts for the plane.

The government plans to spend $9 billion to buy the fighters for Canada's Air Force, but it has been criticized by opposition parties for not obtaining guaranteed industrial regional benefits from Lockheed Martin in exchange.

Court rejects Israeli's refugee claim

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Federal Court judge in Toronto has turned down a refugee claim by a Ukrainian immigrant to Israel, upholding a refugee board's finding that the man's refusal to serve in the military would not lead to persecution that warrants refugee status.

Judge Michael Kelen found that the refugee protection division (RPD) of the Immigration and Refugee Board had reasonable grounds to conclude that Yuriy Goltsberg left Israel because of the fear of terrorist attacks, not due to fear of persecution or any ground that would have met the legal definition of a refugee.

Goltsberg, who became an Israeli citizen, faced the same danger as other Israelis, and fear of terror is not grounds for a refugee claim, the judge ruled.

Furthermore, Goltsberg's claim he could not kill anyone while serving in the military is likewise insufficient, the judge said.

"[Goltsberg] in this case made no efforts to seek an exemption from Israeli military service, despite the availability of medical-psychological exemptions, and a specialized committee which exists to accommodate conscientious observers. The applicant provided no explanation for his failure to even make inquiries into the possibility of an exemption… It was open to the RPD to find that the applicant did not rebut the presumption of state protection, which in this case is particularly strong since Israel is a democratic country with specific mechanisms designed to accommodate persons similarly situated to the applicant."

Kelen also noted that the refugee protection division found Goltsberg waited three years after his arrival in Canada in 2004 before he claimed refugee protection.

"This is a significant delay, which the applicant [Goltsberg] failed to explain. It was reasonably open to the RPD to find that the applicant's explanation, that he waited to see if the security situation in Israel was improving, could reasonably excuse the delay. It was reasonably open to the RPD to find that the applicant's delay indicated that he feared terrorism and not his compulsory military service and draw a negative inference as to his credibility," Kelen ruled.

Pressel finishes seventh at Canadian tour event

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The last time a Jewish female pro golfer passed this way was in 1992, when the Du Maurier Ltd. Classic was held in Winnipeg at the St. Charles Golf and Country Club

Back then Amy Alcott was already a golfing legend. She would eventually be elected to the World Golf Hall of Fame following 30 seasons on the Ladies Professional Golf Association (LPGA) tour, during which she won 29 championships, including five majors

Playing in that same tournament was a less-well-known 33-year-old golfer also pursuing her dream, Nancy Rubin, who was raised in a Conservative Jewish home in Pittsburgh. But while Alcott, 36 at the time, had already tasted the thrill of victory multiple times, Nancy had yet to capture a title following a dozen years of frustration. She played from 1980 to 1995, never winning a pro title. Her career best finish was a third-place showing in 1983 at the Inamore Classic, plus three top-20 finishes in 1990, when she earned a total of just over $50,000 (all figures US).

Fast forward to August 2010 and the CN Canadian Women's Open, a $2.25 million LPGA Tour event. Played again at St. Charles, another Jewish phenom graced the leader board, the talented and articulate Morgan Pressel, 22, who oozes personality.

Pressel finished the tournament in seventh place after rounds of 72-66-74-69 for a score of 281, just two strokes out of second and five back of the winner Michelle Wie.

Pressel earned $64,276 for her efforts, bringing her year's win total to $646,217, 11th overall among money leaders, only $20,000 behind Wie.

So far this season, she won the Japan LPGA Salonpas Cupher in May and finished second in the Evian Masters, which earned her $243,000. She's finished in the top 10 seven times.

Pressel, who has often stated that her Jewish faith plays a large role in her life, has taken home $3.5 million in winnings during her brief career.

Morgan Pressel

Her stats suggest she's at her best off the tee and on the green. At 77 per cent, she's fourth overall in keeping the ball on the fairways, and she's tied for first in putting when hitting the green in regulation, averaging 1.75 puts per green. She's also seventh on the tour in birdies, ninth in overall putting average (28.89 per round) and is 10th in scoring average at 71.08.

Pressel, who from 2006 to 2010 played in 114 tournaments and made the cut 101 times, was particularly impressed with Canadian fans and offered that "I always enjoy coming here to Canada. I've always felt we should come here more often because the crowds are so tremendous. Everybody really loves their golf here."

More than 65,000 spectators took in the tournament, just short of the event's record set in Ottawa in 2008.

On the Tuesday prior to the event, Pressel participated in a Callaway function, which included breakfast and a clinic at the largely Jewish Glendale Country Club.

The Tampa, Florida-born athlete was raised in a Jewish home the child of Mike Pressel and Kathy Krickstein Pressel.

At age 12 she became the youngest player to qualify for the U.S. Women's Open, a record that stood six years until it was broken by Alexis Thompson, another 12-year old only several months her junior.

She finished her amateur career as 2005 American Junior Golf Association (AJGA) junior girls player of the year after winning a total of 11 AJGA titles. That same year, Pressel won the U.S. Women's Amateur title and was a member of the champion Junior Solheim Cup Team.

The young prodigy turned pro after appealing to the LPGA to become a member one year prior to her 18th birthday. She played part-time on the tour while still attending high school.

In 2007, Pressel was one of three co-leaders starting the final round of the U.S. Women's Open in Denver. She was tied for first on the 18th but scored a bogey and lost by two strokes, finishing tied for second.

That same year, she earned her first victory at the Kraft Nabisco Championship and by so doing became the youngest-ever winner of an LPGA major golf tournament, seven weeks short of her 19th birthday.

Needless to say, sponsors sought her out in growing numbers after she captured two additional events.

Her meteoric rise was interrupted by tragedy when in September 2003, at age 15, she lost her mother, Kathy, to breast cancer. At that time, her grandparents, Evelyn and Herb Krickstein, a retired physician and pathologist who is also her coach, took her in while her two siblings remained with their father. Sister Madison now plays golf for the University of Texas.

Already a five-year tour veteran, Pressel spoke prior to the start of the CN Canadian Open at a sponsor's breakfast and shared her own surprise at being so successful at both the amateur and pro games at such a young age.

"It's very exciting and an honour having major champion next to your name. It's something I'll have for my whole career and it'll never go away," she said. "Future winners will only get younger."

Pressel doesn't worry much about the even younger competitors who are following her because, "as tough as the competition is getting I'm getting better. I'm definitely more confident," she said.

Pressel said that sometimes she has to pinch herself when she contemplates how far she has come. "I knew I wanted to play golf professionally when I was 12, when I first qualified for the Women's Open. Doing what I love at such a young age and meeting so many people is so great. If I wasn't in golf now, I'd probably still be in school maybe become a doctor."

Hats off to a woman who's helping the IDF

Channah Koppel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Three years ago when her eldest son was 20 and serving a five-month winter term in Hermon in Israel's snowy northwestern tip as an Israel Defence Forces paratrooper, Channah Koppel decided she had to help.

"He said all the boys in his unit were cold. I wanted to do something to say thank you for being out there in the cold and looking out for us," says Koppel, 44, who, in 1986, moved to Israel from Montreal, where her father had served as Rabbi of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem in Cote St-Luc.

Koppel mobilized her Chicks with Sticks knitting/crocheting group in Gush Etzion, and that winter, she sent the first shipment of 10 tuques to her son's unit. Thus, Hats for IDF Soldiers was born.

"Soon, other soldiers saw the hats and wanted to have them too," Koppel says, explaining that the winter nights in the Negev desert in the south can also be bitingly cold. "All of a sudden, I thought we're going to need a lot more hats."

An IDF soldier wears a 'Koppel' creation

Koppel posted ads on Internet sites to solicit knitters and crocheters. "I can't explain how quickly it exploded," she says. "In no time, people started sending my postings out to synagogue and school lists and to people who knit, and it just mushroomed."

What started with a few knitters and crocheters in Gush Etzion quickly expanded into a global network of hundreds of knitters and crocheters from Australia, New Zealand, the United Kingdom, the United States, Canada and Israel. To date, this network of well over 700 have knitted and crocheted more than 12,000 tuques for IDF soldiers in combat units.

"It has grown into this incredible network of kind and giving people," Koppel says, "and it really started from nothing. It just happened."

Koppel suggests that "a lot of people seem to really connect with [the project] because it's immediate and personal and not complicated. You make a hat with your own hands and it goes on a soldier's head," she says. "It's very different from writing a big check. It's a small, personal gesture and people seem to enjoy doing it. The soldiers are also very touched to receive them. It warms both their body and soul."

Each hat arrives with a label that reads: "Knit for you with warmth and love" (in Hebrew), and a personal note. The labels are produced as a charitable donation by a graphic artist and printer from Efrat.

The hats follow a strict pattern to meet IDF specifications. For instance, they must be made of black machine-washable wool, according to certain measurements.

Although the IDF supplies soldiers with a hat in their kit bag, it is made of synthetic fibres such as fleece, is not adjustable for different head sizes and doesn't fit easily under helmets. "I hear from soldiers all the time that the hats we make are the ones they actually wear," Koppel says.

Two winters ago, Koppel partnered with A Package from Home, a non-profit organization that sends packages to IDF soldiers with no family in Israel, to distribute the hats to lone combat soldiers. "I wanted to reach more soldiers," says Koppel, who now sends some of the hats to A Package from Home for direct distribution.

This winter, Koppel hopes to distribute at least 5,000 hats. "We live [in Israel] and here [the army] is something we all have to do. It's not like in Canada. We don't have the same kind of relations with our neighbours here," she says. "These [combat soldiers] are really putting themselves out there on the line for us. These are the people who really deserve an extra thank you."

CHEESECAKE BALL

8oz pkg cream cheese, softened
½ c. softened butter (no substitutes)
¼ tsp vanilla extract
¾ c. confectioner's sugar
2 tbsp. brown sugar
⅔ c. mini chocolate chips (must be mini)
⅔ c. finely chopped pecans
Graham crackers

In a mixing bowl, beat cream cheese, butter & vanilla until fluffy. Gradually add sugars, beat until just combined. Stir in chocolate chips*. Cover and refrigerate 2 hours. Place cream cheese mixture on a large piece of plastic wrap and shape into a ball. Refrigerate at least 1 hour. Just before serving, roll cheese ball in pecans. Serve with graham crackers.
*You may add flavors such as toffee chips, peanut butter chips, along with chocolate chips ... chop into smaller pieces.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

ALBERT EINSTEIN AND MEYER WEISGAL

American journalist Meyer Weisgal, right, came to Toronto to be editor of the Jewish Standard, a magazine that first appeared 80 years ago, in 1930, to counter anti-Zionistic editorials that Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath wrote for a rival Jewish publication. Under Weisgal, the Jewish Standard reached a high point in Canadian Jewish journalism – "truly an international journal of the highest level," historian Ben Kayfetz once wrote – but it went downhill after his departure around 1932. Weisgal, however, went on to greater things, becoming a trusted adviser and personal assistant to Chaim Weizmann and later president and chancellor of the Weizmann Institute of Science.

Canadians boycott Ahmadinejad at UN

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad once again addressed the UN General Assembly last week, and once again, Canadian diplomats didn't turn up for his address.

In what is becoming something of a tradition, Canadian parliamentarians and officials boycotted Ahmadinejad as he spoke to the world body on Sept. 21 as part of a three-day summit that focused on the UN's Millennium Development Goals and culminated in the start of the 65th General Assembly.

Canadian Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon was among the delegates who refused to attend Ahmadinejad's address, because of the current Iranian regime's record of human rights abuses and illegal pursuit of nuclear weapons.

In a statement last week, Cannon said Canada is "very concerned by the overall human rights situation in Iran, as well as by Iran's regional activities, its failure to comply with

Peres, Harper meet in New York

UN Security Council resolutions and its refusal to co-operate with the [International Atomic Energy Agency]."

He added that past speeches by Ahmadinejad at the United Nations contained "elements of Holocaust denial, anti-Semitism and condemnation of Israel."

It's because of this continued behaviour, Cannon said, that Canada believes Iran "violates the UN's spirit of international co-operation" and has "chosen not to engage with Ahmadinejad in this forum."

Ahmadinejad validated Cannon's position two days later when he addressed the UN General Assembly a second time and alleged that the United States arranged the 9/11 attacks "to save the Zionist regime."

After suggesting in his Sept. 23 address that U.S. officials at the highest levels were complicit in the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, he called on the UN to establish "an independent fact-finding group" to investigate the attacks, and proceeded to lash out at Israel.

The News in Brief

Canada

Krystal Hits The Fan

TORONTO — Toronto-born radio personality Andrew Krystal became the new a.m. drive-time host of Canada's largest all-sports radio station last week. The acerbic Krystal, who joined the Fan 590 in Toronto last month as its mid-morning host, was announced as the new 5:30-9 a.m. host last Monday and made his early morning debut the next day. Prior to the Fan, he hosted a Halifax-based, non-sports morning show that was simulcast on three Rogers-owned stations in the Maritimes. He previously worked in Toronto for Newstalk1010 and AM 640.

World

School Vandalized

SEATTLE — A Jewish high school in the Seattle area was defaced with anti-Semitic graffiti. The epithets in orange, blue and grey paint on the Northwest Yeshiva High School on Mercer Island included swastikas and references to gas chambers, the Seattle Times reported. The attack occurred late on Sept. 16 and was discovered the next morning, on Erev Yom Kippur. The graffiti covered most of the building's outer wall, including on the second floor. Area residents helped to clean off the graffiti before Yom Kippur services were held in the school's sanctuary. Police are examining the school's security tapes.

Hero Honoured

LONDON — A statue honoring the "British Schindler" was unveiled at a train station in Britain. Sir Nicholas Winton, 101, attended the dedication ceremony Sept. 18 at the Maidenhead railway station. He smuggled 669 mostly Jewish boys and girls out of Czechoslovakia in 1939. The bronze statue shows Winton sitting on a park bench reading a book containing pictures of the children he saved.

Charges Dropped

PHOENIX — Rape and sexual abuse charges against a Phoenix rabbi were dismissed six months after his very public arrest. The case against Rabbi Bryan Bramly was dismissed Sept. 15 in New York County Supreme Court. Rabbi Bramly, 45, has been spiritual leader of Temple Beth Sholom of the East Valley since 2006. He was arrested March 23 in the parking lot of the shul by the U.S. Marshals Child Predator Apprehension Team and New York City police detectives. The married father of two was alleged to have raped a seven-year-old girl in March 2000 when she was spending the night at his family's home in New York, where he was finishing rabbinical studies at the Jewish Theological Seminary. The girl, now 17, reported her allegations to authorities in August 2009, but the district attorney in the case said there were inconsistencies in evidence and that the complainant was unable to remember details of the alleged incident.

Denier Barred From Leading Camp Tour

David Irving

WARSAW — The Auschwitz museum won't allow a British historian who denies the Holocaust to give a tour at the site of the former concentration camp.

David Irving can't lead a tour group at Auschwitz because he's not a licensed tour guide, officials of Poland's Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum said last week.

Irving, 72, was in Poland to lead a tour of British and U.S. tourists to key Nazi sites, including Hitler's headquarters and the Treblinka death camp, as well as the Warsaw Ghetto and Auschwitz.

In an interview this month with the British Daily Mail, Irving criticized Polish authorities for turning Auschwitz into a "money-making machine," and accused them of building fake watchtowers. Irving said other death camps have been neglected because they are not as "marketable."

He was jailed for Shoah denial in Austria in 2006 for a 1989 speech that said Auschwitz had no gas chambers.

Dancers Boycotted

NEW YORK — Two New York-based human rights groups have organized a boycott of shows by Israel's national dance company. Adalah-NY: The New York Campaign for the Boycott of Israel and the New York chapter of Artists Against Apartheid announced the move in an open letter to the Batsheva Dance Company, which was slated to perform in New York from Sept. 21 to Oct. 3. They said they called the boycott because of the company's "collaboration with the Israeli state and its Brand Israel campaign," a government PR initiative designed to reshape preconceived notions about Israel.

French priest seeks to uncover Jewish graves

Father Desbois looks for extermination sites in eastern Europe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Patrick Desbois is in a race against time.

The 55-year-old French Roman Catholic priest is president of Yahad In Unum, a Paris-based organization dedicated to finding the mass graves of Jews killed in eastern Europe during the Holocaust.

Desbois relies on local witnesses to identify the sites of heretofore undiscovered mass executions in Ukraine, Russia, Belarus and Poland, where millions of Jews were murdered in a savage and systemized campaign of genocide.

Without their assistance, it would be next to impossible to locate and identify these sites, he said in an interview from his office in Paris last week.

Since many of the remaining witnesses are reaching the end of their lives, Desbois has no time to waste.

"We won't know where the graves are unless we speak to the witnesses," he said.

The grandson of a French deportee to a Nazi prisoner of war camp in Ukraine, Desbois will speak about his experiences when he visits Canada early in October.

His appearances in Toronto on Oct. 4 will be at the University of Toronto's His appearances in Toronto on Oct. 4 will be at the University of Toronto's Sidney Smith Hall at noon and at Beth Tzedec Congregation at 7:30 p.m. at noon and at Beth Tzedec Congregation at 7:30 p.m.

On Oct.5, in Montreal, Desbois is scheduled to address the Azrieli Foundation at the Centre Mont-Royal at 7:30 p.m.

Ordained as a priest in 1986, he co-founded Yahad In Unum in 2004, five years after being appointed secretary of the episcopal committee of the French Bishops for Relations with Judaism.

His co-founders were leaders of the Catholic and Jewish communities in France.

In addition to improving relations between Catholics and Jews, Yahad In Unum's goal is to find the mass graves of Jews murdered by Nazi mobile killing units, known as Einsatzgruppen, in Ukraine, Russia, Belarus and Poland.

Yahad In Unum's work is sanctioned by the Vatican.

Patrick Desbois

By all accounts, 1.2 million Jews were killed in what was then the Soviet Union. A further three million Jews were slain in Poland.

Desbois' interest in the Holocaust was piqued by his grandfather, Claudius, a soldier in the French army who was deported to a Nazi prison camp in Ukraine, Rawa-Ruska, in July 1942.

"He always told me it was awful," Desbois said. "But he refused to speak about it."

Propelled by curiosity and a desire to pay his respects to its victims, mainly Soviet soldiers captured in battles with the advancing German army after its invasion of the Soviet Union in 1941, Des-bois visited the camp, which is 150 kilometres from the city of Lwow.

During his travels in Ukraine, he was dismayed to learn that the graves of the Jewish victims of the Holocaust were generally not marked.

In the past six years, Desbois and his associates have found about 600 extermination sites, containing a still undetermined number of corpses.

Their work is funded by the German government and a host of private foundations.

Her gift to us was colour

From the editor's desk...

It was only many years after I first met Karla Goldberg that I understood who she was.

Her first words to me were straightforward and to the point: "Come. Sit here. We have plenty of room for you at the table. Don't be shy."

Unannounced, invited effusively without her knowledge by her oldest son whom I had met less than two weeks earlier at the start of our first year of university, I appeared suddenly in her home, a new face with a hearty appetite.

Of course, I obeyed. And I ate heartily, as I would many times in the home that I soon discovered was the avatar of open-hearted, open-handed kindness to individuals, groups and causes the world over.

Karla always gave more than she took – except when it came to information concerning herself and her past. In this, as in so many other respects, she was the perfect mate and complement to her husband, Dave.

I knew that Karla and Dave had met and married after World War II in Europe. Dave worked for the the American Joint Distribution Committee, helping to find, clothe, house and rescue the meagre remnant of the Jews of Europe. At that point, I could only imagine the circumstances of Karla's life that had brought them together. But even then, I knew that whatever I imagined was but a feeble strand of a mostly unimaginable story.

When she was 19, some four months after Kristallnacht, Karla, her parents, Leo and Else, and her brother, Werner, left their home in Bochum, in northwest Germany. Though her father was a decorated veteran of World War I, the Nazis interned him in a concentration camp during Kristallnacht. Immediately after his release, he took his family to France.

To say that they left their home meant, in hard fact, that they left their business, property, possessions, friends, context, history and self-definition.

Often separated, Karla and her family, spent the war either hiding from German forces or captured by them.

But they survived.

In 1948, Dave and his young bride arrived in Toronto, where they interwove their remarkable lives and created an incomparable, multi-textured fabric of benevolence and love.

Karla was an artist.

In addition to an extra place at her table for a suddenly appearing new face, Karla also maintained an art studio in her home.

Self-taught in the many media in which she worked – mosaic, hooking, weaving, needlepoint, drawing and painting – Karla used colour the way God uses the rainbow: emphatically, generously and according to a purpose and a design that were hers alone.

Her work and her life, she wrote some 25 years ago explaining the driving force behind her labours, "have been truly colourful – from the darkest greys to the most vibrant colours.

"The ups and downs of my life challenged my imagination... These changes [the ups and the downs to which she euphemistically referred] were transformed, in my way, into a variety of media and forms." (My emphasis.)

And what was Karla's way? Complex composition, intricate balancing of pattern, shape and image, depth and dimension, angles and arches, and the ubiquitous display of bold, deep colour were her hallmarks.

And courage.

Eight years ago, Karla suffered a stroke that paralyzed the right side of her body. Her ability to do her work came to a devastatingly abrupt and demeaning end.

But only temporarily.

She forced herself to work with her left hand.

Two years later, an exhibit of some 40 of her works was curated at Baycrest in Toronto. Titled Creative Strokes of the Brush: Karla Goldberg and Her Artistic Journey Post-Stroke, it was the visible proof of the irrepressibility of the human spirit. More precisely, it was the visible proof of the irrepressibility of Karla Goldberg's spirit.

One of her sons once insightfully described his mother in terms of the work that emanated from her hands and her soul.

"Flashes of colour and creativity/ beautifully juxtaposed/ a kaleidoscope of crazy perspectives/ from the depth of a heart.

"A palette/ warm and alive/ fresh and full/ everday/ magnanimously painting an enviable picture."

Years later he would lovingly add, "If it is true that a picture is worth a thousand words, then a piece of Karla's art speaks a thousand thoughts."

On an end-of-summer day recently that was gold and blue, Karla was laid to her final rest in a secluded, well-groomed cemetery in northern Toronto, a continent, an ocean and a full, daring, momentous, colourful life away from the small industrial town of Bochum in northwest Germany where it began 90 years ago.

An eye-catching, deep crimson rose lay upon her simple, unadorned coffin. It was one last splash of colour, one last gift of creativity she would have been happy knowing that she shared with us. Colour – intense, dazzling and brilliant – was her signature.

It was also, more to the point, the essence of the life she created with her family out of profound darkness – a gift she gave to us all.

Her memory will always be for blessing.

Former NYC mayor blasts Obama on Mideast

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

U.S. President Barack Obama has sought to weaken Israel's resolve in his quest to achieve peace in the Middle East, former New York City mayor Ed Koch charged in an interview last week.

Obama has emboldened the Arabs to make greater demands of Israel by suggesting that the United States no longer has a special relationship with the Jewish state, claimed Koch, who was here to address a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto dinner.

Ed Koch

"What he has tried to do is to weaken Israel by conveying to the Arab states the message that there is no longer such a special relationship," said Koch, who was mayor of New York City from 1978 to 1989 and has since worked as a political commentator.

"The Democratic party is more supportive of Israel than Obama," he added.

Koch, a U.S. congressman before becoming mayor, said Obama is trying to force Israel to bend on vital security matters, and that Obama treated Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu insultingly when he visited the White House last March.

As a result, Obama's support in the U.S. Jewish community has dropped by a substantial margin, said Koch, a Democratic party supporter who has withdrawn his support of Obama.

Koch, who has frequently endorsed Republican party candidates for office, said Obama has softened his position toward Israel in recent months.

"He has drawn in his horns and decided to retreat. But once trust has been broken, it's near impossible to put it back again," he said, adding that Obama has jeopardized the United States' special bond with Israel.

Describing himself as a "liberal with sanity," Koch said that while Obama is not anti-Israel, he wants to forge a new relationship with the Arab world.

Declaring that the United States shouldn't adopt a neutral policy on the Arab-Israeli conflict, Koch said Israel's security needs should be treated with paramount importance and Israel's qualitative military edge over the Arabs must be maintained.

Koch, who says he's in favour of a two-state solution and territorial concessions from Israel to make peace with the Palestinians possible, portrayed himself as a supporter of Israel's Labor party rather than Netanyahu's Likud party.

Turning to current peace talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority, Koch said that if Israel extends its partial moratorium on construction in West Bank settlements, the Palestinians should reciprocate by recognizing Israel as a Jewish state.

Jews in the West Bank should be able to stay in their homes, either as citizens or non-citizens of a Palestinian state, he said.

Before Israel and the Palestinians sign a final agreement, he added, one Palestinian government should be in control of both the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, which has been controlled by Hamas since 2007.

He said that the Hamas regime should be "removed" so that Fatah can take over.

Arguing that diplomatic and economic measures won't deter Iran from pursuing its goal of assembling a nuclear arsenal, Koch said the problem can only be resolved by military means.

He said he'd prefer a joint U.S.-Israeli effort, backed by Sunni Arab states such as Saudi Arabia.

"The only thing worse than a U.S. attack on Iran would be Iran coming into possession of a nuclear bomb," he said, paraphrasing John McCain, a former U.S. presidential candidate.

Koch believes Iran will attack Israel once it acquires a nuclear capability.

Weighing in on the controversy over whether an Islamic community centre and mosque should be erected near the site of the twin towers, destroyed by Arab terrorists in September 2001, Koch said that while Muslims have every right to build there, they should be sensitive to criticism and choose a site elsewhere in New York City.

He expects homegrown terrorism in the United States, carried out by American citizens of the Muslim faith, to grow in the future.

"But we are not at war with Islam. The vast majority of Muslims are decent people who mean us no harm. But we should not be afraid to call Islamic terrorists and all other terrorists by their rightful name."

Koch, who backed the U.S. invasion of Afghanistan in 2001 and of Iraq in 2003, called for the immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from these countries.

It's not about a construction freeze

As these words were being written, Israel, the Palestinian Authority (PA) and the United States were engaged in detailed nighttime brinksmans' negotiations in an effort to resolve the crisis surrounding the decision by the Netanyahu government to let its 10-month freeze on settlement construction in the West Bank expire without renewal. The negotiations were expected to continue a number of days.

It must be borne in mind that the crisis is wholly of the PA's making. Only with the installation of the Netanyahu government two years ago did the PA demand an a priori end to construction in the West Bank as a condition of merely entering into peace discussions. Never once in the 15 years preceding the installation of the Netanyahu government did the PA make this demand of an Israeli government. Never once during those years did construction for Israelis in the West Bank prevent bilateral or multilateral peace talks between and among the interested parties.

Nevertheless, irrespective of the cause of the crisis, one cannot deny that a crisis exists. That it is real. That the entire western world and its media are fixated on it. And that it threatens to overturn, perhaps for a long time if not permanently, the very negotiations table itself.

That must not happen.

The stakes are far too high, the possibilities too palpable and the moment too significant to let it slip away, a victim of ultimatums by the PA and dysfunctional party politics in Israel.

It seems that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and PA President Mahmoud Abbas both understand this.

At a meeting in Paris on the weekend, Abbas reportedly said both sides know that compromise on the construction issue is necessary.

Netanyahu essentially pleaded with Abbas not to overturn the table

"I call on President Abbas to continue the good and honest talks that we have only just started, in order to reach a historic peace agreement between our two peoples," Netanyahu said. "Israel is ready to pursue continuous contacts in the coming days to find a way to continue the peace talks," he added.

On Monday, Abbas said he would take his time and consult the Arab League before deciding whether to walk out of negotiations.

In truth, the PA's threat to quit the talks is not – nor has it ever really been – about construction in the West Bank. It is rather, about the shape of the permanent borders that will demarcate the two future states of Israel and Palestine. To some extent, it may also be about future face of Israeli electoral politics. To be sure, there are a great many interconnected, complicated issues to be either joined or separated by the parties and resolved. With goodwill on both sides and a keen sense of the urgency of the hour, it can be done.

The leaders of Israel and the PA should set aside distractions and, in their place, embrace the negotiations that a majority of both peoples desire.

Negotiating territory away

The article "The peace talks – and their obstacles" (Sept. 16) repeats a common misconception, that the Palestinians are "settling for 'only' the West Bank and Gaza, 22 per cent of British Mandate Palestine." The fact is that when Britain was granted the mandate over Palestine after World War 1, the territory intended for a Jewish home was considerably larger. However, in the early 1920s, Britain unilaterally split off some 80 per cent of the mandate to create Transjordan, today's Jordan, which has a majority Palestinian population. Now, the Jews of the Middle East are negotiating away a further 22 per cent of their tiny 20 per cent of the original territory. Which makes one wonder just who has always had to settle.

Extreme views not shared by all haredim

In his column "The threat of piety" (Sept. 22), Rabbi Dow Marmur gives the impression that haredim in Israel are a quasi-homogeneous block, ignoring that, as in any ideologically motivated community, there are extreme views not shared by all. He cites a book by Rabbi Yitzchak Shapira "giving ostensibly halachic endorsement to the killing of gentiles, even non-Jewish children." This totally disingenuous statement omits the context in which it was expressed. Rabbi Shapira shares the ideology of the late Meir Kahane, the founder of the Jewish Defence League, and the quote refers to a largely misguided and discredited, but also misinterpreted right, both preventive and active, of Israeli self-defence as a reaction to unprecedented attacks.

After adhering to the alarm of those who see a trend to "Talibanize" Israel, Rabbi Marmur concludes his harediad by affirming that "piety can be a lethal weapon in the quest for power." He may be right, although much worse is misconstruing the intentions of those who are extremely religious, but are not in any other way extremists.

Not up to us to judge others

It is troubling to read what can be described only as homophobia dressed up as Orthodox Judaism in letters to The CJN, the most recent of which was "Torah prohibits homosexual behaviour" (Sept. 8). In this letter, it is suggested that it's impossible to be both gay and an Orthodox Jew. Who is the letter writer to determine who is a Jew, Orthodox or otherwise? When did God delegate His judging responsibilities to others, rabbis or otherwise?

The letter goes on to suggest that Congregation Shaar Hashomayim in Montreal committed a "radical break with tradition" in allowing someone to speak at an Orthodox shul about being Orthodox and gay. Imagine that – a break in tradition! It is some of these traditions that have served as the foundation of Judaism and kept our religion alive and well for thousands of years, but it is narrow-minded and hurtful comments and views that will continue to exclude and demonize human beings that are part of our faith. Those who speak ill of others and continue to try to exclude people from our religion are themselves violating the laws of the Torah, the same Torah that they accuse homosexuals of violating. It is time that we allow our thinking to evolve and that we do not lose sight of the fact that God created us all equally and that it is not up to us to judge or to marginalize our fellow human beings.

The number of days Hamas has held Gilad Schalit captive

Traditional ways ensure Jewish continuity

In the letter "Right to pray regardless of gender" (Aug. 12), the writer decries the ban for women to pray and read the Torah at the Kotel. His claim is that more than a century ago, the liberal Jewish movement of Europe and North America sought new ways to express their Judaism.

One hundred years is long enough to show results. If you look at Jewish life around the globe, you can clearly see that only the communities that chose the traditional ways lived a Jewish lifestyle every day and brought up Jewish children and grandchildren who are still continuing our beautiful heritage.

The ordination of women as rabbis, the letter writer wants us to believe, "was a shining moment in the history of Judaism." How many Jews did this shining moment return to the fold and how many married Jewish?

I conclude with a plea to your readers. Please give your children a traditional Jewish education, because this is the only guarantee that there will always be Jews today, tomorrow and forever.

Canada's connection to the Schalit family

'It fills me with pride'

Noam Schalit addresses a group of Canadian Birthright visitors.

By STEVEN ARIE GLOWINSKY
Special to The CJN

A national debate is taking place in coffee shops, restaurants and Shabbat dinner tables in Israel.

The question is whether the government should secure the return of Gilad Schalit, kidnapped by Hamas in 2006, at any cost. In answering this question, of course, there are several arguments – for and against.

I could not possibly imagine any event in Canadian society that would be as nationally uplifting in Israel as the return of Schalit to his family, friends and countrymen. To many, he would become a national hero, a symbol of the bravery and perseverance of the Israel Defence Forces.

As brothers, sisters, children and parents, we can all empathize with the Schalit family. Although we can hardly understand their torment and suffering, we can indeed understand how their hearts would heal by his safe return.

The homecoming of one of the IDF's lost sons would also invigorate morale. As one soldier, Nati Shapiro, said to me, "Who would want to enlist in an army that tells its soldiers it will abandon them if they are captured?" Gilad's return would reaffirm a motto familiar to all Jews, one that also guides the IDF: Kol Yisrael arevim zeh la'zeh (All of Israel is responsible one for the other).

Is the Schalit family not entitled to a commitment for their son's safe return from a government that conscripted him for compulsory military duty?

Those people opposed to merely submitting to Hamas demands for Schalit's release of freeing more than 1,000 people currently in jail in Israel put forward a three-pronged argument to state their case.

First and foremost they say that the release of hundreds of terrorists with blood on their hands would be perceived as an act of gross injustice against past victims of terror and their families. It would be unjust, they say, to let the criminals and murderers go free.

Secondly, they argue, some, if not most, of the freed prisoners will return to extremism and committing acts of terrorism. As a result, all Israeli citizens would be endangered. The harm that would be inflicted on Israeli society would be far greater than the benefit of retrieving a single, though much beloved, captured soldier.

The third argument is the most compelling. Terrorist organizations will see that the tactic of kidnapping Israelis – and trading them for a disproportionate number of terrorists – is a successful one. They will see that they can empty Israeli prisons of fellow terrorists by exploiting the Jewish state's commitment to securing the return of her children. "Veshavu banim legvulam" (Jeremiah 31: 15-17). Israel's enemies perceive of the moral dilemma with which the country struggles as a "weakness" in the Israeli psyche to be exploited.

In my view, there are certain instances in which supporters of Israel living outside of the country, Jews and non-Jews alike, have no right to exert pressure on the Israeli government with the goal of influencing its national and security policies. The debate surrounding Schalit is one of those instances.

My point of view is not intended to belittle anyone's passion for Zionism, Israel advocacy, or connection to Israel and the IDF. It is merely an assertion that there are some political matters best left to Israel's citizenry to debate.

We all want to see Schalit returned as soon as possible. But the conditions facilitating his return should be influenced by the opinions of Israelis.

With that philosophy in mind, my Birthright Israel bus visited the Schalit family tent outside the Israeli prime minister's house in Jerusalem on July 16. The Schalit family has erected a tent outside Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's residence in Jerusalem, and they have declared that they will remain there until Gilad is returned.

Gilad's father urged us not to forget his son

As the leader of 33 young touring Canadian Jews, I was filled with pride to witness and be part of the demonstrations of unwavering support for the Schalit family conveyed by my Birthright group. My visit to the Schalit tent was among the most powerful experiences I have ever had in 12 visits to Israel.

For four years, I have known the name Gilad Schalit. I know his story, recognize his face and the faces of his parents. This visit, however, brought the tragic story to life. Connecting with it was emotionally overwhelming.

Gilad Schalit was no longer a name I read in newspapers or in Facebook groups. He is a real man with a real family that longs for his return from years of captivity.

At the tent, we met Gilad's father, Noam. He spoke to us in a soft tone. His hope for Gilad's return and devotion to his son are inspiring.

He urged us not to forget his son and to do everything within our power to advance Gilad's cause. His message lived in our hearts throughout the duration of our experience in Israel.

Before the end of our Birthright trip, our group signed personal messages on a Canadian flag, which the group's tour-guide, Yoav Bruck, a veteran leader of some 75 Birthright trips, and I personally delivered to the Schalit family. Our flag now hangs in the Schalit tent, a symbol of Canadian Jewry's steadfast support for the Schalit family.

They now have friends in Canada who think of Gilad every day, pray for his well-being and dream for his return. I cannot speculate what comfort this may bring them.

I know for certain, however, that this act of solidarity speaks volumes about the strength of the Canadian Jewish community and its connection to Israel and her sons and daughters in the IDF. It fills me with pride. I was honoured to represent my country in this endeavour.

Our Canadian flag has already affected other visitors to the Schalit tent.

One week after its delivery to the tent, Bruck happened to pass by and noticed a group of tourists writing on it. He approached them to find out why they were writing on the flag and he told them how it came to be there.

"They told me that they weren't aware that they were in the area of the Schalit tent and they were not so familiar with Schalit's story," said Bruck.

"They were Canadians who saw a Canadian flag on the other side of the street and walked over to see what it was all about.

"One of the Canadians was very moved by what she saw. She was near tears when she asked me if it was okay for her group of friends to add their names to our flag. I was, of course, happy to let them do it."

It was our pleasure and privilege to represent Canadian Jewry to the Schalit family. Now that we are back in Canada, we continue to pray for a happy ending to the tragic Schalit affair and realize how important it is to support the Schalit family while advocating for their son's release from his captivity in Gaza.

Chelsea, Marc and the Jewish problem

It's a new age for the Jewish people. Two hundred years ago, Jews battled bigotry and prejudice. Today, Jews are so well-accepted that it was perfectly conventional for Chelsea Clinton – daughter of former U.S. president Bill Clinton and current Secretary of State Hillary Clinton – to marry Marc Mezvinsky in a ceremony that featured a tallit and sheva brachot, a rabbi and a minister. Jews have thoroughly integrated into North American society, and as a result, bigotry is scarce and intermarriage common.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

For Jewish pundits, the Clinton-Mezvinsky wedding is a religious Rorschach test. For some Jews, it's even a source of pride, a sign Jews have truly arrived. Others fret, issuing jeremiads about how the Jewish community has failed. Orthodox polemicists blame the failure of the liberal movements, outreach professionals blame the community's failure at outreach, and Zionists see this intermarriage as indicative of the failure of Diaspora Judaism. Articles and sermons agonize about this contemporary "Jewish problem," a crisis of assimilation and indifference.

These pundits make compelling cases, but in some ways, they're missing the point. Assimilation isn't occurring just because Judaism has failed. It's occurring because all institutions, including Judaism, are declining. As others have noted, institutional thinking has eroded across the board, in schools, sports and business. Respect for, and devotion to, institutions is disappearing.

Assimilation occurs when the institution of Judaism becomes a secondary concern, superseded by one's individual needs. And since individualism is the order of the day, few can justify passing up true love in order to respect a millennia-old tradition. Some have tried to repackage Judaism into user-friendly parcels that are more appealing in our age of individualism. They've offered Jewish wisdom about leadership and family, and even tips on kosher sex. I use this approach myself, and it certainly makes Judaism more relevant and meaningful. But ultimately, this approach will fail as a weapon against assimilation, because in our zeal to make every Jewish practice useful and beneficial, we've actually undercut the very foundations of Judaism.

Judaism is founded on a sense of duty. We fast on Yom Kippur, even though it's uncomfortable. We circumcise babies, even though it's painful. We do so because Judaism is a transcendent institution that we revere.

Abraham, the founding father of Judaism, proudly announced, "Hineni" – I am ready. He was ready to sacrifice for any and all of God's demands. And throughout history, Jews have been willing to put Jewish destiny before individual interests. Until now.

Given today's deeply individualistic zeitgeist, who knows if there will still be Jews proclaiming "hineni" at the end of the 21st century.

An invitation to join

The systematic attack on Israel has put Israel – and its supporters – on the defensive. Even as adversaries single out the Jewish state for special opprobrium, making Israel "the Jew among nations," as MP Irwin Cotler notes, these critics try to shut down any defence Jews make of Israel by claiming we are refusing to allow any criticism of Israel at all.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Anyone who reads the Israeli papers and the Jewish press, anyone who pays attention to the rollicking, raucous, and sometimes raw debates about Israel throughout the Jewish world, knows that this criticism is absurd. Israeli political culture and Jewish public culture are both highly self-critical. And that is our strength. Democracies have a marvelous self-correcting mechanism that comes from airing dissent. Israel – and Jewish public life – showcase that trait in excess.

Nevertheless, it is necessary to distinguish between those who criticize Israel – even passionately – and those who delegitimize the State of Israel. In that spirit, I met earlier this year with a few colleagues in Jerusalem, who range in political orientation from left to right, are religious and non-religious, but all are firmly within the Zionist camp.

We decided to issue a document articulating just what red lines we as Zionists voluntarily choose not to cross. To keep it positive, we also decided to articulate what we call the blue-and-white lines illustrating just what those of us in the broad pro-Israel community affirm.

It was remarkable how easy it was to reach consensus, even as we weighed every word, thought intensely about every concept. We did not merely have goodwill – we shared a common vision of a vital, democratic Israel. We are attempting to restore some sanity to the debate around Israel by refuting both the argument saying that because some delegitimize, you can never criticize, and the argument claiming that criticizing the delegtimizers is an attempt to silence all critics. Unlike other petitions that seek to lead with names, we want to lead with ideas, but invite people who agree with us to click on our website www.restoringsanity.info and sign their names.

The website has the full statement. To summarize briefly, our four "blue and white lines":

1. affirm the validity of Zionism as the Jewish national movement,
2. recognize Jews as a people for whom Israel is their ancestral homeland,
3. note that Israel is a democratic state promising all its citizens equal rights, and
4. call for compromise based on the fact that affirming Israel's and Zionism's legitimacy does not negate Palestinian claims or rights.

The six "red lines" wherein criticism degenerates into delegitimization are:

1. attempts to deny Israel's right to exist or to negate the Zionist movement, the Jewish State or the Jewish People's status as a nation
2. demonizing Israel and Zionism by equating either with the 20th-century's worst racist ideologies such as Nazism and South African apartheid, or treating Israel as uniquely cruel.
3. using double standards such as calling Zionism – but no other nationalism – racism, or singling out Israel for disproportionate criticism.
4. essentialism: jumping from vigorously denouncing particular policies to repudiating Israel or Zionism.
5. promoting the one-state solution, thus negating the Jewish People's right to self-determination.
6. trying to undo Israel's establishment by emphasizing the "right of return," or displaying maps of Mandatory Palestine without Israel.

It is depressing that we even have to spell this out, given that the criticisms we criticize are invitations to more war, more unreason, more anguish on both sides. We urge honest critics of Israeli policy to distance themselves from the stains of the past and the poisons of the present, keeping the debate focused on the actions and policies of all the participants in the conflict, rather than Israel's essence, or Israel's existential right to exist.

Anyone who wishes to join us or learn more, should click on our website, sign, but, most important of all, start taking your own initiative to fight this insidious, misleading, often (but not always) anti-Semitic attack on Israel, the Jewish People, democracy and decency.

Too busy

I admit it: while writing my Rosh Hashanah sermon, I was also hanging up my laundry, making breakfast, checking my e-mail, helping my kid pack and answering the phone. I was blissfully multi-tasking, until the eggs burned and my kid packed something by mistake, because I didn't really pay attention when he asked, "Should I pack this one?" Then and only then did I close Skype, turn off the "beep" that alerts me every time I get an e-mail and let the laundry basket lie fallow.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Toronto

Last year, I took a year off to live in Israel, where I wanted the unique experience of being, not doing. It took all my internal strength to just relish an afternoon spent at the vegetable market, to just drink in the bus ride, to just look out the windows without figuring out an answer to everyone's queries as to what I was "doing" for the year.

But when I returned home, how hard it was to keep that "just being" concept alive – not to check my new iPhone every few minutes to see what new app I can download or to check my e-mail to see how valued and important I am. It's so hard to really listen when someone else talks, to turn off the calendar in my mind that keeps churning while they're speaking, as I wonder when I'll get to the next thing on my list.

Our kids are usually someplace else, too, even when they're with us, turning their heads to us with one eye still on Facebook, ear buds in their ears. It's the same with co-workers, even when they seem to be listening, when they look up and down from their e-mail and say, "uh huh, uh huh," or do the thumb dance under the table while we're talking to them.

But for some reason, we want to keep up with the frantic pace we've set for ourselves, so we keep on multi-tasking with phones on each ear.

But recent scientific research is challenging the claims of multi-tasking. Heavy multi-tasking fatigues the brain, draining it of the ability to focus. I recently read in the New York Times that computer users at work change windows or check e-mail 37 times an hour, or every 1.6 minutes. Can you imagine changing your shoes every 1.6 minutes? Well, some of us can, but in essence, we aren't fully attentive to any one thing for more than a minute and a half.

Yikes.

Prof. Earl Miller, a neuroscientist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, suggests that the human brain doesn't multi-task like an expert juggler. Rather, it switches frantically between tasks like a bad amateur plate-spinner. We're all spinning plates madly, convincing ourselves that we simply have to spin them all, at the same time, and that we enjoy it, and that it's good for us and for our families and for our society. But how many plates can we spin before they all come crashing down on us?

Let's be honest: we love our distractions. They help us to avoid pain, and to avoid ambiguity. They make us feel productive, important and busy. They keep us from going home on time, from facing the kids, from facing the spouse, from making our home lives the centre of our attention, one friend at a time, one problem at a time, one thought at a time. If we can't be happy, well, then let's be busy. But we're so busy that we miss our lives half the time while we're living them.

The new year gives us a chance to try once again to encounter people face to face, without Facebook; to listen fully and pay full attention, and to plug in on a real level, with other human beings, with ourselves, and with our world. It's one more chance to stop being busy and start just being.

The Kirshner File

Two films, two realities

The Gaza Strip, a festering political sore on the body politic of the Arab-Israeli conflict and a redoubt of Hamas, was the focus of two radically different documentaries screened at the 35th Toronto International Film Festival.

Precious Life, a poignant film directed by the Israeli television reporter Shlomi Eldar, turns on the frantic quest to save the life of a four-month-old Palestinian boy from Gaza who was born without an immune system and will die unless he receives a bone marrow transplant at an Israeli hospital.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Tears of Gaza, by the Norwegian filmmaker Vibeke Lokkeberg, graphically examines the impact on Palestinian civilians of Israel's war with Hamas in the winter of 2008 and 2009.

The first film is inspirational and positive. The second is gut-wrenching and, from my point of view, totally and gratuitously one-sided.

Let's start with Precious Life, which marks Eldar's debut as a director.

In 2007, the year Hamas violently wrested control of Gaza from Fatah, Eldar – a Channel 10 correspondent who had long reported from Gaza – received an urgent phone call from Dr. Raz Somech, the director of the pediatric immunology lab and cancer research institute at the Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv.

The physician told Eldar that Mohammed Abu Mustafa, the son of Fauzi and Raida Mustafa, would die unless he received a bone marrow transplant. Two of Raida's previous children had died because they had not had access to such cutting-edge surgery, Somech said.

The procedure would cost $55,000. If the funds could not be raised, the infant would have to be sent back to Gaza. Once there, he would die, since hospitals in Gaza cannot perform such life-saving operations.

Galvanized by the prospect of saving a child and getting his hands on a great story, Eldar sprang into action. Eldar's report touched the heart of an Israeli man whose son, a soldier, had been killed in the line of duty. He donated the required sum anonymously, as Palestinian Qassam rockets continued to rain down on Israeli towns and kibbutzim adjacent Gaza.

Appropriately enough, Eldar dedicates Precious Life to this individual.

Raida, a devout Muslim who had been taught that Jews are "dangerous" and "scary," was grateful but puzzled by the donation.

"The Israelis do strange things for us," she said.

Now that money was no longer an issue, it was left to Eldar to find a genetic match in the Mustafa family for the procedure to go forward.

Although he was no longer permitted to visit Gaza, much less report from it, Eldar used his contacts there to arrange for blood samples to be sent to Tel Hashomer. Raida's brother brought them to Israel through the Eretz border crossing.

The samples matched, and Raida wept with joy.

Since Israel was being bombarded by Qassam rocket attacks, the question naturally arose whether a bone marrow donor would even be able to cross the volatile border. During a lull in the fighting, one of Raida's relatives managed to slip through.

At this juncture, Raida made a confession. Her son's treatment in Israel had prompted accusations in Gaza that she and her husband were collaborating with Israel, the enemy.

This led to a troubling conversation between Eldar and Raida.

In short order, she unleashed a number of candid and hurtful comments that almost caused Eldar to drop out of the mission.

Raida said that Jerusalem belongs to the Arabs, that Palestinians are prepared to sacrifice lives to win statehood, that life is worthless compared to death and that Mohammed would be raised as a martyr for the Palestinian cause.

Raida Mustafa and her baby boy

A clip from Tears of Gaza

In other words, he would be a suicide bomber one day.

Shocked and full of despair over Raida's incendiary remarks, Eldar contemplated removing himself from the case. Fully cognizant that Mohammed's life lay on the line, Fauzi intervened, asking Eldar for forgiveness and explaining that his distraught wife was in a fragile state of mind.

Chastened by Eldar's reaction, Raida amended her views, saying she would not raise Mohammed as a shahid. However, she could not resist noting that a passage in the Qur'an predicts war between Jews and Arabs. As she goes back to Gaza after Mohammed's successful operation, Raida observes that the Arab-Israeli conflict should be resolved. In light of her earlier comments, one wonders how sincere she is.

As the war in Gaza rages, Eldar keeps in touch with the Mustafa family. In an aside, he says that Israel used disproportionate force – "exaggerated fire" – to respond to Palestinian provocations.

Lokkeberg, the director of Tears of Gaza, would doubtless agree that the Israeli armed forces applied too much force to deal with Palestinian rocket salvos. Her documentary, financed by the Norwegian Film Institute, is filtered through the eyes of three young Palestinians – Amira, Yahya and Rasmia – who lost relatives during Israel's fierce land, air and naval offensive and through footage shot by three Palestinian cinematographers.

"We need to bring the reality of war to the screen," Lokkeberg has been quoted as saying.

Tears of Gaza, which reportedly will be screened in Israel next month, is a tableau of stark images: bombed-out buildings, frightened civilians scurrying for safety amid Israeli air raids, an enraged Palestinian man holding aloft the corpse of a child at a mass funeral, firemen desperately trying to douse flames, ambulance drivers delivering wounded and dead to a hospital, and the wan, lifeless, bullet-hole-ridden bodies of children displayed in a morgue.

Amid menacing images of Israeli helicopters, jets, tanks and navy vessels carrying out patrols or firing missiles at intended targets, Palestinians vent their anger at Israel.

"May God punish them," says an old woman.

"They are inhuman," cries a disconsolate man whose children have been killed.

"They are killing children and have stolen our land," says a young woman.

Not once in the film does Lokkeberg say that the war in Gaza was caused by Hamas' refusal to renew a ceasefire and its continuous bombardments of Israel.

Without bothering to cite a reason, she merely says that Israel launched an attack on Gaza. Period.

She thus wilfully ignores the Palestinian provocations that triggered the war – the aggressive rocket attacks that have caused death and destruction in Israel since 2001 – and Hamas' ideological commitment to destroy the Jewish state.

Lokkeberg has faithfully documented the terrible costs of war on a civilian population in Gaza. But her film is skewed and selective and demonizes Israel.

Meet The Romspen Fund's Largest Investor

The Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund manages over $500 million in short-term Canadian commercial mortgages and Shelly Esbin has always been its largest investor. Even though he is president of Romspen Investment Corporation, Shelly has paid $10 per unit just like the 2000 other investors.

Of course Shelly's family, friends, partners and co-workers are also investors. Why? For many good reasons, like solid returns month after month, year after year.

You've heard of the Romspen Mortgage Fund. Isn't it time you found out more?

Municipal Vote 2010

Effective transit top priority in Ward 21

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and RITA POLIAKOV

This week's Toronto municipal election coverage focuses on Ward 21, St. Paul's.

According to the 2006 census, the ward is home to nearly 50,000 people, with Jews representing close to 10 per cent of the population, making them the ward's largest ethnocultural community.

The ward is bounded to the north by Briar Hill Road, to the east by parts of Bathurst Street and Spadina Avenue, to the south by Dupont Street, and to the west by sections of Ossington Avenue and Winona Road.

There are six candidates vying to represent the ward on council: Marius Frederick, a TTC worker; Alex Freedman, a computer programmer; Beth McLellan; incumbent Joe Mihevc; Peter Nolan, a TTC worker, and Shimmy Posen, an entrepreneur.

McLellan couldn't be reached for this article.

The CJN asked each candidate the following question: What are your priorities for the ward if you're elected?

Marius Frederick: My priority for the ward is to clean up the crime and graffiti. To me, the place has gone down. There's people sleeping in laneways, there's people begging, there's graffiti everywhere. It's becoming a ghetto.

I want to put police back on the beat. We've got druggies in the neighbourhood, people spraypainting in the nighttime. It's going to cost a little bit more, but what are we paying for now?

Garbage collection has to be cleaned up. Basic services have to be done in a timely fashion. I spoke to some lady in the neighbourhood. She fell down in the last major snowstorm, because the roads weren't cleaned. This is not acceptable.

I don't believe the proposed light rail transit line (LRT) will do it for the vision for the future. I think it'll be the same thing as the St. Clair streetcar, which created a traffic problem in the area. If elected, I will work with council to get people on St. Clair with businesses affected by the St. Clair streetcar a refund for the time they suffered.

Alex Freedman: The most important priority would be having an Eglinton subway. The proposed LRT just isn't adequate for our needs. Subways last much longer than LRTs, but we need to consult the public.

We need to make the TTC a better alternative to other forms of transportation… to make it more competitive by lowering fairs and reducing transit times. We should investigate an automated payment system.

I want to improve city services, including garbage collection, so that people are really seeing value for their money. One of the biggest problems people have with increased taxes is that they're paying more money to the city, but the value they're receiving for that money has decreased greatly over the years.

Joe Mihevc: The biggest issue facing our ward is the construction of the Eglinton LRT. On the plus side, for the next four years, there will be little evidence of construction, because the borers will be tunnelling underground. People won't see evidence of the construction, but between 2014 and 2016 we will have to pop up and build stations above-ground at Eglinton West subway station and Bathurst and Spadina-Chaplin.

My hope during this process is that we really focus on this project to look at the opportunities that present themselves at the Allen Expressway and Eglinton Avenue, not just TTC-wise, but pedestrian-wise and traffic-wise. Because the tunnel for the LRT is so deep, there might be a possibility to get the on-ramps underground. If we can do that, which we're exploring right now, that would be wonderful for the community.

The real fiscal challenge is to work with the province, recognizing that it's also very tight with money these days, and ask how we can put in place the financial uploads that need to happen. You cannot keep asking the property taxpayer to pay for social assistance and TTC costs.

Peter Nolan: Locally, I hear the same concerns that can be attributed on a citywide level: potholes on the street and… customer service from the city. They never tell you when they're going to do things. They wake you up in the morning with construction. There's just this simple format to it. Citizens have no idea what days city work crews are working or cutting services off. That's a local issue, but it's also a city hall issue for customer service. We need more openness and transparency there.

I've worked the route on St. Clair and saw the work on the streetcar lines was a horrible idea. The whole Transit City plan is… from the 1950s. I support subways over streetcars, and I feel the TTC needs to be designated an essential service.

I also want the city to post its budget online, so we can see exactly how much money they get from us and hold them accountable for any wasteful spending.

Shimmy Posen: My main priority is to get city hall back on track. We're paying too much for a city that doesn't work. I want to make sure we don't have a repeat of what happened with the streetcar fiasco on St. Clair. It destroyed the quality of life. It destroyed the businesses there. It scared people, because it was managed horribly, and someone needs to take responsibility for that mistake.

I prefer to see subways built along Eglinton instead of a short-term street car. The subway is the only way to reduce gridlock.

It's a disgrace that our taxes have gone up… and our services have decreased. Garbage collection used to be twice a week, now it's once a week, and we're paying for it.

Israeli educator embarks on new adventure

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Last year, Estelle Halak-Tastasa, her husband, Yossi, and their three children left their home in Israel for a 10-month adventure travelling through Thailand, Vietnam, Australia, New Zealand and China.

"It was the most amazing thing we did, ever," said Halak-Tastasa, who taught the children – now 12, 9 and 3 – while they were travelling. "We dreamed about it a long, long time [before we went.]"

This summer they embarked on another – less exotic – adventure, leaving Israel again, this time to experience life in Toronto, where they have family.

On Sundays, Halak-Tastasa, 40, can be found at Kachol Lavan, the Centre for Hebrew and Israeli Studies, where she teaches Grade 1.

"It is special to work at Kachol Lavan," said Halak-Tastasa, who also works part-time at a daycare centre. "We're doing the studies with a lot of songs and stories." The teachers plan their classes together and share a common philosophy, she said.

Halak-Tastasa likes to include songs, art, drama and games as part of her lessons. She believes the experiential component helps students feel connected to what they're learning about.

A lesson from the teacher: "I think people need to know what their dreams are, and do something to fulfil them."

"When we need to teach them stories from the Bible," she offered as an example, "I think the best way to really get to know the stories is with songs and drama, because if students are just hearing the stories, they're not really feeling them."

Halak-Tastasa's classes are conducted in Hebrew with exceptions only when necessary, if students don't understand. "I want them to love the language," she said.

An Israeli who was born in Lebanon and lived there until she was a year and a half old, Halak-Tastasa grew up in Herzliyah, the second of four children in her family.

From an early age, she worked with kids, looking after her two younger siblings, babysitting, and working as a youth movement leader. She remembers saying as a small child that she would be a teacher when she grew up.

But it was only after she finished her army service and spent a few months at Neot Hakikar, a moshav near the Dead Sea, that she found the specific direction she wanted to pursue after observing a class that her aunt taught there. "She had a girl in her class who was deaf. It was amazing how she worked with her. It was fascinating to me."

Halak-Tastasa went on to earn a bachelor's degree in education at Tel Aviv University in 1996, specializing in hearing disabilities and learning disabilities, as well as community theatre studies.

Among other teaching positions on her CV, Halak-Tastasa taught and served as special education co-ordinator at the pluralistic (religious and non-religious) Keshet School in Zichron Yaakov from 2005 to 2009.

Ex-Shin Bet chief speaks on disabilities

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Canadian Friends of AKIM Israel is gearing up for a series of events next week with former Israeli navy chief, ex-Shin Bet chief and former member of Knesset Ami Ayalon.

But it's Ayalon's current role as chair of AKIM Israel – National Association for the Habilitation of the Mentally Handicapped in Israel, that is of particular interest to the Toronto-based group.

AKIM was founded in 1951 in Israel by the parents of an intellectually challenged son. It's the largest Israeli organization for people with intellectual disabilities, said Diane Richler, event chair for Ayalon's visit.

The organization provides a range of services, including kindergartens and nurseries, after-school activities, group homes, job training, recreational programs and support to families throughout Israel.

Ami Ayalon

Torontonians Olga and Alex Eisen, who have an intellectually challenged son, started Canadian Friends of AKIM in 1962, following their first trip to Israel, where they visited a weaving workshop run by AKIM.

At the time, Alex, now president of the Canadian group, belonged to a bowling league that had raised $1,000 for charity, but hadn't yet allocated the money.

The cause was "very close to my heart," recalls Olga. Within 10 days of the Eisens' return home, she and some friends had organized a tea, which raised $3,000 for AKIM.

Now, she said, the original organizers are aging, and are hoping to breathe new life into the group here – one of 10 such groups worldwide – with Ayalon's upcoming visit.

Richler said that the Canadian friends' group has been "operating under the radar screen in recent years," quietly supporting the Israeli group. She became involved this summer after completing her term as president of Inclusion International, an advocacy organization for people with intellectual disabilities with about 200 member organizations worldwide. Richler met Ayalon at a conference in Berlin in June, the month her presidency ended.

"I think it's really heartening that someone of his stature is standing behind AKIM," she said. "But I think it's also very important that he sees more inclusion in Israel as a way of helping to build and strengthen Israeli society.

"People who learn to include people who have an intellectual disability can learn to include everybody," she added.

Among the factors motivating Richler's involvement, she mentioned the new United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, which Israel has signed and expects to ratify by the end of December. "It focuses on recognizing people with disabilities as people who have both rights and responsibilities.

"For a few years now, AKIM has been supporting people with disabilities to volunteer in the IDF or get involved in national civic service.

"Israel is now the first country to recognize people with disabilities as full members of the forces, and to allow them to contribute to Israeli security and its ongoing future."

Ayalon's schedule includes talks in a private home on Oct. 4, in a downtown office on Oct. 5 and, at York University, under the auspices of its Jewish teacher education program, on Oct. 6.

For further information about Ayalon's first two presentations, call 416-955-0300; or, for information about the presentation at York, e-mail Prof. Sarah Horowitz at srh@yorku.ca.

FREEDOM DAY: Grade 7 and 8 students from Thornhill Public School attended Freedom Day on Sept. 20, at Queen's Park. The event, organized by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center, celebrated tolerance, justice and human rights, and aimed to teach the students how to fight hate and prejudice.

Number Two in a Series New Challenges. Eternal Strength.

IN THE WAR OF IDEAS, ARE WE SENDING OUR CHILDREN UNARMED?

Throughout history, the Jewish People have endured unimaginable hardships that often threatened Jewish existence itself. We have survived them all. And today, with the same steadfast determination, we stand strongly against new threats.

A global movement is denying Jewish Peoplehood, questioning Israel's right to exist, revising Jewish history, attempting to weaken Jewish identity among our young. Our community has an historic opportunity to collectively combat these developments.

Your support will allow UJA Federation to fund bold programs that equip our young people to deal with today's disturbing trends, encouraging more of them to experience Israel and inspiring a new spirit of Jewish activism.

Let's work together to keep our youth proud and strong.

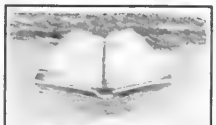
Jewish Life

We, too, must shift our thinking

By RABBI JONATHAN CRANE

Just like last year and the year before that, we begin our new year with many celebrations. Some of these holy days honour the renewal of creation, while others create ways to renew our honour. On some of these days, we sit outside to appreciate all the more what's inside. And, at the end of it all, we reread what we've already read, which takes us to the beginning of it all again.



Rabbinic Reflections

The cyclical nature of the Jewish calendar is famous for its regularity. Liturgically speaking, 5771 will look very much like the thousands of years before it.

We find comfort in the predictability of our calendar: every seven days we will rest; every month we acknowledge the moon, and every season has its celebrations – just like last year. Just as our tfillot are regimented, so, too, is our learning. The calendar divides up the Torah into parshiot, pacing our reading through the Torah, as if to say that we would do well to ration our accumulation of wisdom.

This notion of rationing is nothing new, either. God sent forth just enough manna to the people in the wilderness to feed them each day (with twice as much to cover Shabbat, of course), and the people were warned against hoarding, lest the manna rot. As God rations food, so, too, should we.

In this week's haftorah for Simchat Torah, Joshua orders the officials of the people, "Go through the camp and instruct the people, 'Prepare provisions for yourselves, for in three days time you will cross the Jordan.'"

Yet this must have been a challenging mandate for the ancient Israelites. Even as the people still mourned for Moses, Joshua required them to abandon their generation-old pattern of minimalism and start to accumulate foodstuffs, though not for immediate gratification, but for delayed satisfaction.

On the one hand, this required rejecting God's freshly baked and quickly spoiling daily bread in favour of storable provisions. The people now had to identify foods that could survive beyond a single day, and indeed, that could last for an indefinite future. On the other hand, the people now had to calculate just how much they would need for this uncertain future. Whereas previously someone else predetermined how much food each should receive and when, they couldn't rely on this system any longer. They had to fend for themselves.

In short, Joshua was asking the people to experience a cognitive and behavioural paradigm shift. He wanted them to think radically differently about food itself, and about calculating future needs – and then act on those careful deliberations.

This double paradigm shift was a singular step for the Israelites' difficult journey ahead. They were about to embark on a radically different way of existing, and they had to think and behave in dramatically new ways. For 40 years, they wandered through a vast wilderness and survived at God's behest. Now they were to enter a particular tract of land, settle it, till it, defend it and survive therein by their own resolve.

To be sure, God would still be involved in their lives after they crossed the Jordan. Still, their future in that land rested less in the hands of the leaders – human or divine. Their future, as Joshua astutely observes, lay in the hands of the masses, for they were the ones who were to identify and gather the appropriate provisions.

By rethinking our food and recalibrating our consumption, we the masses may ensure our future, yet again.

Rabbi Jonathan Crane is a member of the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the scholar of bioethics and Jewish thought at the Center for Ethics at Emory University in Atlanta, Ga.

Sharing the world

Throughout Sukkot, we are focused on remembering God's protection in the wilderness when we were young and vulnerable. After coming out of Egypt, the Jewish people roamed the Sinai wilderness for 40 years following God. It was a time of transformation, a time to build trust and a time of inward organization, infrastructure and identity. It seems amazing to consider that all of that was accomplished in 40 short years.

Midrashic Moments
By Rachael Turkienicz

During that entire time, we dwelled in temporary huts, or sukkot, which we could easily and quickly take apart and rebuild as the travelling necessitated. It was a frail existence within a temporary dwelling that is vulnerable to the elements and vulnerable to any hostile force we might encounter. We survived in the wilderness because God protected us, since clearly the sukkot could offer no protection whatsoever. It's clear why the holiday of Sukkot reminds us of those precious moments.

Yet, when the temples stood, ancient Israel celebrated the holiday of Sukkot by offering sacrifices for the nations of the world. Throughout the seven days of the holiday, Israel offered 70 sacrifices to symbolize the 70 foreign nations of the world. These were offerings for peace as well as prosperity. Only on the last day of the holiday, Shemini Atzeret, the eighth day, was Israel instructed to make sacrifices on its own behalf.

The sages of the Talmud also teach us that Sukkot is the holiday on which the world is judged for rain. The day of Hoshana Rabbah is the day that the decree for rainfall is sealed. We walk in circles around the synagogue praying for the proper rainfall throughout the world. The midrash tells us that when the last sacrifices were offered, the people would silently watch the smoke to see which direction the wind would carry it. Some directions meant rain was forthcoming, while others foretold droughts.

The historic connection to Sukkot speaks of the Jewish people and God bonding in the wilderness, a place of solitude with no rain. There are no other nations crowding Israel in the Sinai Desert, and there are no floods of rain to worry about. The wilderness presents an ideal place for relationship-building, since it's a place of isolation with no distractions or competing philosophies. Yet it's unique in Jewish history and will never repeat.

The ongoing celebration of Sukkot balances the picture by deliberately including the larger world with all its manifestations. Both the natural world and the social-political world around us will inevitably impact us and ultimately force us to question ourselves and God.

With subtle wisdom, Judaism reminds us that we don't live in a wilderness, but in a natural world with other people and other nations. We can't pray only on our own behalf, but we must pray and include all of humanity in our thoughts and hopes for peace and well-being. When we feel so humbled by this that we question what impact we could possibly have, we are reminded that we can even impact how much rain will fall this coming year.

Such is the power of Sukkot.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

You never know...

PAST FORWARD
By Alex Gropper

Most of us are familiar with the stories of our origins as a people and of the Patriarchs who gave rise to our faith. Yet, archeologists and secular biblical scholars have cast doubts on their historical veracity.

In the last few decades, most secular scholars have viewed the stories as myths. However, we should keep in mind how Gregory Nagy, former head of classics at Harvard University, explained the word "myth." He said it is society's way of defining universal truth.

In North America, as recently as 50 years ago, there was still a broad consensus that the patriarchal stories were set in a historical context that could be proven by archeology. Such was the view of American biblical scholar William Foxwell Albright, who, with his students, led and championed this position.

In Europe, the Germans never held to Albright's view. Led by such brilliant scholars as Albrecht Alt and his pupil, Martin Noth, they relied on textual criticism, not archeology, in defining their position, and had always cast doubts on the historicity of the patriarchal narratives.

In North America around the time of Albright's death in 1971, his consensus began to unravel. Scholars including Tommy Thompson and John Van Seters, who taught me in graduate school at University of Toronto, began a serious attack on Albright's view and that of his disciples. The eminent Canadian Egyptologist, Donald B. Redford, even dated the Joseph stories to the Saite period in Egyptian history (c. 600 BCE).

The culmination of this assault was led by a group labelled as Minimalists. In addition to Thompson, it included the Danish scholar Nils Lemche and a number of British historians such as Philip Davies and others, who were primarily associated with the University of Sheffield.

Some of these scholars even questioned the existence of prominent biblical personages such as David. However, they were dealt a serious blow in 1993 when an inscription mentioning the "house of David" was found at the site of Tel Dan in northern Israel.

A more potentially spectacular discovery was made in the mid-1970s when Italian scholar Giovanni Pettinato, of the University of Naples – the epigrapher for the Italian excavations at the site of Tell Mardikh, ancient Ebla, in northern Syria – claimed to have discovered a number of pre-patriarchal names amongst the cuneiform tablets uncovered at Tell Mardikh. Pettinato even claimed to have found the five cities of the plain mentioned in Genesis, starting with Sodom and Gomorrah, in exactly the same order as in the Bible.

Much was made of this discovery by the eminent American scholar David Noel Freedman when Pettinato and the director of the Ebla excavation, Paolo Matthiae, came to North America. However, a few years later, a number of noted scholars showed that Pettinato's assertions could not be proven. As a result, Freedman and other supporters of Pettinato's initial claims were left with scholarly egg on their faces.

Today, few scholars seriously believe that we can verify the historicity of the Patriarchs and Hebrew origins. Albright's consensus of 50 years ago appears to be in the same position as Humpty Dumpty's was after his fall. And yet, one never knows what a new discovery may reveal. If one believes in the existence of the Patriarchs, then they exist for that person. After all, faith, by its very definition, defies proof.

I will always remember the stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob recounted to me as a young boy, and of the faith that they represented. It is a faith that I still believe in despite the vagaries of archeological discovery.

Food and drink for Simchat Torah

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

Passover has matzah. Purim has hamantashen. Even Shavuot has blintzes. But what about Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah? No special foods may spring to mind (except perhaps memories of marching around the synagogue carrying a small flag topped by an apple). As the holiday season draws to a close, you can still enjoy some marvellous traditional foods – or perhaps start a new one.

The seventh and final day of Sukkot is called Hoshanah Rabbah, which comes 10 days after Yom Kippur and shares some traditions with the Day of Atonement. [http://bit.ly/simchat1] The cantor wears white and chants prayers using Yom Kippur tunes. And in honour of both holidays, we eat kreplach, triangular pockets of dough with meat or other stuffing.

Actually we eat kreplach in honour of three holidays – on Purim, too. All these days share a common theme: personal or collective survival. On Yom Kippur, we are judged. On Hoshanah Rabbah, the judgment that was rendered on Yom Kippur is "sealed." And on Purim, the entire Jewish people was threatened, and eventually triumphed. [http://bit.ly/simchat2]

As to why we eat kreplach, the Nishmas site suggests that judgment (symbolized by meat) is clothed in kindness (symbolized by the dough). [http://bit.ly/simchat3] Now that you know why, you can take your pick of 13 kreplach recipes in the Jewish Food Archives, including bite-sized meat, chicken liver or cheese. [http://bit.ly/simchat4]

When Hoshanah Rabbah ends, we turn to Shmini Atzeret/ Simchat Torah when we complete – and then restart – the annual cycle of reading the Torah. The Union of American Hebrew Congregations' Jewish Parent Page says you can learn a lovely lesson while baking a Simchat Torah Challah – with dough shaped like the Hebrew letters lamed and bet. "The last word in Deuteronomy is Yisrael and the first word in Genesis is Bereshit. If you take the final letter of Yisrael – the lamed – and the first letter of Bereshit, the bet, and put them together, they spells leib in Yiddish and lev in Hebrew, which means heart. The midrash tells us that the Torah is the lev – the heart of the Jewish people." [http://bit.ly/ simchat5]

Or how about enjoying Penny Eisenberg's Orange Crepe Scrolls? "Place two crepes next to each other on each plate, so that they look like Torah scrolls. Stick the slivers of orange rind into the top and bottom of each roll to look like the Torah poles." Enjoy them with Grilled Spiced Citrus Chicken Kebabs and Biscotchos (Sephardi Crunchy Orange Almond Cookies). [http://bit.ly/simchat6]

Still hungry? There's Honey-Orange Chicken, Susie Fishbein's Moussaka, Basic Stuffed Cabbage and Unstuffed Cabbage, which gives you "that great taste without all the work." [http://bit.ly/simchat7]

Jews have been known to raise a glass or two on Simchat Torah to celebrate (responsibly, please) our never-ending relationship with the Torah. While some may opt for schnapps, vodka or perhaps a single malt, Tamar Fox suggests some Jewish cocktails to enliven the holiday.

- The Ashkenazi: fill a glass with ice. Float: 1 part vanilla milk, 1 part coffee liqueur, 1 part vodka.
- The Sephardi: an Ashkenazi with a little chocolate mixed in.
- And the "Manischevetini": 2 oz. vodka, 1/2 oz. orange juice and 1/2 oz. Manischewitz wine. Combine ingredients in a cocktail shaker and shake. Garnish with an orange twist if desired. [http://bit.ly/simchat8]

L'chaim! And have a happy (and tasty) holiday.

U of T club gets Heritage Toronto plaque

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The University of Toronto's faculty club has always been a part of the city's history. But now it's official.

On Sept. 16, the Faculty Club, formerly called the Primrose Club, received a Heritage Toronto plaque as part of that organization's initiative to commemorate historical areas in the city.

Located at 41 Willcocks St. on U of T's downtown campus, the club was originally formed in 1920 by members of the Jewish community who weren't accepted into other social clubs in the area.

The building itself, which was acquired by the university in 1959, was designed by Benjamin Brown, one of the first successful Jewish architects in Toronto.

The Faculty Club, the university's social club for staff and faculty, intended to use it as a temporary home, but it eventually became their permanent space.

"There is nothing so permanent as a temporary building," said U of T's David Naylor at the club's 50th anniversary celebration, where the Heritage Toronto plaque was presented.

"Over the years, I've seen such an array of events here. This is the living room of the university," he said.

For club president Debbie Stewart, the Faculty Club is a chance for faculty to connect.

"It's a place to gather, to socialize. It's very important because this is a huge university. It has… [about] 12,000 faculty and staff. You can become very isolated in your own department," she said.

Adam Vaughan, the councillor for Toronto's Ward 20, said that having an opportunity to socialize in an educational institution is essential for staff and faculty.

"The university is much more than an institution. It's the faculty, it's the staff, it's the students. This university is more than a place to get a degree," he said at the celebration. "The faculty club is a spot where ideas from different parts of the campus can collide and new ideas can emerge."

In addition to being a place to socialize, the club will now be an official part of Toronto's history.

And, according to Gary Miedema, the heritage plaque coordinator for Heritage Toronto, it's all because of the Jewish community.

A Heritage Toronto plaque is presented to the University of Toronto's Faculty Club. From left are university president David Naylor, Barbara McPhail from Heritage Toronto, club secretary Roger Riendeau, club president Debbie Stewart and Ward 20 Coun. Adam Vaughan.

"In the 1920s, the city had a number of different social clubs. Many were fairly exclusive… and the Jewish community was not always welcome," he said.

This prompted members of the community to start their own club, he added.

"As the Primrose Club, it was a very important institution for the Jewish community and certainly for the elite of the Jewish community."

Ellen Scheinberg, the director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Ontario Jewish Archives, which is run through the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Learning, agreed, adding that, originally, the Primrose Club was a men's club that eventually let women join.

"They had a separate entrance for women," she said.

Scheinberg said the plaque project is an important one.

"The plaque is important because we want to commemorate Jewish institutions," she said. "A lot of plaques commemorate white, male Protestant [historical sites]. This is an important initiative to commemorate [communities] who are from minority groups."

University of Guelph gets new Hillel House

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Jonathan Katzeff is a Jewish student at the University of Guelph. And now he has a home there.

This school year, Guelph's Hillel, with the help of Hillel Canada through the United Israel Appeal Federations of Canada (UIA), purchased the ninth Hillel House in Canada.

The house, which is an open-concept bungalow, is a five-minute walk from the university and is being rented through funds from UIA.

For Katzeff, a third-year real estate and housing major and the co-president of Guelph's Hillel, the house is more than just a place to socialize.

"We now have a place. A place for us to run programs, to run Shabbat dinners. A place for the Jews at Guelph to come and be together," he said. "We now have an actual home."

Before getting the Hillel House, Guelph's Hillel was run out of a small office at the university that held around five people.

Hava Goldberg, the director of Guelph's Hillel, saw that the Jewish community had outgrown this office.

"It's a tiny little office. It was just a means of us having a place to store our things. We've never really had a place to call our own," she said, adding that events were held in various boardrooms or members' houses.

According to Goldberg, there are about 1,000 Jewish students at the university, 400 of whom are on Hillel's mailing list. Three years ago, Hillel estimated that there were 600 to 700 Jewish students.

"This means the community has continued to grow and replace itself. It's evident on the campus," she said. "The Jewish population at the University of Guelph has really been growing… It's important for Jewish students to have a place where they feel comfortable, where they feel at home."

Which is where the Hillel House comes in. "We're able to offer a lot of opportunities we couldn't in the past," Goldberg said.

One of these opportunities is a Rosh Hashanah dinner, where some 60 students showed up.

The idea for a Hillel House came up around four years ago from a university alumnus and several student leaders.

A proposal was written, an endowment was given through UIA and, after a long search, a house was purchased.

"Right now we're renting this house to ensure that this is the appropriate location. This is the first step of a longer-term plan to buy and own a facility in Guelph," Goldberg said.

Goldberg feels the house is a way to strengthen Guelph's Jewish community.

"We think that the house is helpful in allowing us to reach out to students. First of all, it creates a stronger sense of this being a legitimate organization that has something to offer [students]," she said.

"We have this space that does not just belong to myself – it belongs to every Jewish student on campus. We want Jewish students here to feel like they have something. Like they're part of a community."

Yacov Fruchter, the director of emerging campuses for Hillel Canada, agrees.

"[The house] is a place [students] can use to generate ideas and create this safe space where they can develop programming… and also welcome other communities within the university," he said.

The house is a means of connecting Jews of all backgrounds in Guelph, Fruchter said, as well as creating interfaith opportunities with the Christian and Muslim population on campus.

"[Students] can invite the Christian or Muslim community or any group to participate in what the Jewish community offers," he said.

"I think, ultimately, what the place is going to be is a space where Jews, regardless of their background, can come. Jewish living doesn't have to be an enigma on campus."

Obituary

N.S. businessman recalled for philanthropic efforts

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Irving Schwartz of Sydney, N.S., who passed away Yom Kippur morning, leaves a legacy of superb business acumen combined with a strong capacity for philanthropy and compassion.

Schwartz, who worked a full day Friday before heading home for the holiday, was 81. He had battled cancer and Parkinson's disease for the last two years, but remained totally active in his business and volunteer activities.

Irving Schwartz

Born and raised in New Waterford, N.S., Schwartz developed his business sense at an early age, working in his parents' clothing store with his two sisters and three brothers.

At 13, his mother, Rose, who raised her children and ran the business when her husband died prematurely, sent him on a furniture-buying trip that would shape his business future.

He rose to prominence by building his furniture business, Schwartz Furniture, developing the catchphrase "I guarantee it," which was used in numerous promotional ads through the years.

Schwartz was involved with a number of companies during his life, dabbling in things as diverse as nursing homes, coal-washing and even treasure hunting.

He was the founder and CEO of Schwartz and Co. Ltd. and president of Seaside Communications, a major cable TV distributor in eastern Nova Scotia. He worked to bring high-speed Internet to all parts of Cape Breton, no matter how rural, because he believed it was vital to the business future of the province, comparing the need for high-speed Internet throughout the province to the need for electricity in every home several generations ago.

Giving back to his community was also important to Schwartz. He was involved with the Cape Breton Children's Aid Society, the Lions Club and Junior Achievement. In 1996, he founded the Canadian International Demining Corps, a charitable organization committed to removing land mines from war zones. Its headquarters is in Sydney and Schwartz was chairman of the volunteer board at the time of his passing.

He recently helped lead a campaign to raise $5.4 million for an expansion of the Cape Breton Regional Hospital's cancer centre.

For his many efforts, both in business and shaping a better community, Schwartz was recognized with a number of awards, including induction into the Nova Scotia Business Hall of Fame and the Cape Breton Business Hall of Fame. Schwartz was also an officer of the Order of Canada and held an honorary doctor of laws from Dalhousie University.

Condolences from political leaders poured in as news of his death spread.

"Irving Schwartz was not only a remarkable businessman, his legacy as a community leader and philanthropist will be the achievements for which he is most remembered," Premier Darrell Dexter said in a statement. "I was deeply saddened to learn of his death.

"Cape Breton was very fortunate to have a leader like Irving Schwartz," added Deputy Premier Frank Corbett. "His passion for life, family and community will be sorely missed."

Danny Graham, former Nova Scotia Liberal leader, knew Schwartz for 30 years as a family friend and community leader.

"He's been a role model in Cape Breton. He loved the island and always advanced the best interests of Cape Breton first," Graham said. "Nobody straddled the rails of being both a business leader and a community leader with the kind of excellence that Irving did in Cape Breton."

Schwartz is survived by his wife, Diana Usher, and four children. His funeral took place Sept. 20 at Sydney's Membertou Trade and Convention Centre and was attended by more than 1,000 people, including Dexter and other dignitaries.

Spice of Life

Celebrating the versatility of pineapple

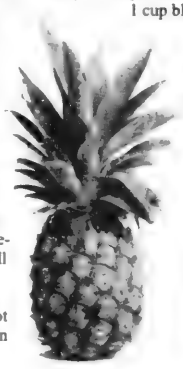
By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

For many of us, there's always a question of what to bring as a hostess gift when you've been invited to share a yom tov or other special meal with friends. A bottle of kosher wine is good in many instances, but I always want to bring something just a little bit different, so I bring wine and fruit.

My favourite fruit of choice is the pineapple. In fact, in tropical climates, pineapples are a symbol of home hospitality and are often given as housewarming gifts, holiday gifts, get well gifts, or for just about any other occasion where a gift would be appropriate.

The pineapple is so versatile that the fruit can be eaten as is or topped with yogurt, or broiled and topped with brown sugar and nuts, used as an ingredient in a salad dressing, a marinade, a main course or even a dessert like the classic pineapple upside-down cake. Whatever your pineapple modus operandi is, the following recipes will make your "gift" one that's never returned.

Note: If fresh pineapple is too expensive or not readily available you can use the canned in its own juice kind for the following recipes.



CUCUMBER PINEAPPLE SALAD

2 seedless cucumbers coarsely chopped
1 red onion, diced fine
1 bunch parsley, chopped
1/4 cup lemon juice
2 tbsp. soy sauce
1 tbsp. sugar
1/4 tsp. chili sauce
2 tbsp. fresh mint, chopped (optional)

Cut cucumber lengthwise in quarters. Slice each quarter into 1/4-in. slices. Peel pineapple and cut into quarters. Remove core. Cut each quarter in half and slice into 1/2-in. slices.

Combine cucumber, pineapple, onion and parsley leaves in a bowl.

In another bowl, combine lemon juice, soy sauce, sugar and chili sauce. Pour over salad and toss together. Serve on a platter. Serves 6 to 8.

Submitted by Randi Percelle St. Louis Mo.

PINEAPPLE SALAD WITH HONEY DRESSING

2 to 3 cups bite size pineapple chunks
2 to 3 cups bite size cantaloupe chunks
1 to 2 cups seedless grapes
2 cups strawberries sliced
1 cup blackberries or blueberries or raspberries

Honey Dressing
1/2 cup sugar
1 tsp. prepared dry mustard
1 tsp. paprika
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup honey
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 cup rice wine or apple cider vinegar
1 cup oil
1 tsp. onion, grated
1 tsp. celery seeds
1 tbsp. poppy seeds

In a large bowl, combine the fruit and toss gently. Cover and refrigerate.

In a blender, combine the sugar mustard, paprika, salt, honey, lemon juice and vinegar. Blend until combined and then slowly add the oil while the blender is on. Pour the dressing into a bowl and add the onion, celery seeds and poppy seeds. Mix to combine, cover and refrigerate until ready to serve. To serve, spoon the dressing over the fruit and toss to combine. Serves 6 to 8.

You can also serve this over salad greens.

PINEAPPLE CHICKEN SALAD

2 lb. cooked chicken (or turkey – I use leftovers)
1 to 2 cups diced pineapple
3 or 4 stalks celery, sliced
1 red pepper, diced
1 cup mayonnaise
2 tbsp. non-dairy creamer or soy milk
1/2 tsp. celery salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
1 cup toasted pecans

In a large bowl combine the chicken, pineapple and celery and mix to combine.

In a small bowl, combine the mayonnaise, milk, celery salt and pepper. Add the mayonnaise mixture to the chicken and toss to combine. Chill for at least 30 minutes. Sprinkle the pecans over top just before serving. Serves 6.

Submitted by Charlotte Janovski Chicago, Ill.

UPSIDE DOWN PINEAPPLE CUPCAKES

1 pineapple cut into chunks, drained (save the juice; you won't need to use all the pineapple.)
1/3 cup packed light brown sugar
1/3 cup unsalted butter or margarine, melted
1/4 tsp. cinnamon

Cupcake Batter:
1 cup flour
3/4 cup sugar
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 cup butter, room temperature
1/2 cup reserved pineapple juice or milk or water
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1 egg

Preheat the oven to 350. Spray a nonstick muffin pan with vegetable spray. Place the pineapple chunks on paper towels to drain completely.

In a small bowl, combine the brown sugar and melted butter. Divide the mixture evenly among the muffin pan cups. Arrange the pineapple chunks decoratively on top of the sugar mixture but only just cover the bottom – don't put too much pineapple in each one. Set the pan aside.

In the bowl of an electric mixer blend together the butter, sugar and pineapple juice, beating for 2 minutes until smooth. Beat in the egg until combined and then add the flour and baking powder, Mix to combine. Spoon the batter over the fruit in the muffin pan, filling each cup three-quarters full. Bake for 30 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted into the cupcake comes out clean. Cool the pan for 5 minutes, then place a wire rack on top of the muffin pan and invert. Let the pan stay on top of the cupcakes for about 15 seconds to make sure that they release from the pan. Remove the pan and let cool completely on the rack. Makes 12.

Hamilton schools to use Hana's Suitcase as educational tool

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The story of Hana's Suitcase has touched the hearts of thousands of readers around the world and next month, thousands more will be exposed to the moving story of the teenage victim of the Holocaust.

Today's Family and The Hamilton Jewish Federation present

Inside Hana's Suitcase

Special Benefit Film Presentation

Hana's story has captured the hearts and minds of people the world over.

Don't miss this event which will promote meaningful discussions about the effects of prejudice, racism and intolerance, while at the same time serving as a testament to the power of hope and the strength of the human spirit. We know that this will contribute to making 'Hamilton the best place to raise a child.'

Hamilton Place Theatre

On Oct. 4 and Oct. 5, 4,000 students from the Hamilton-Wentworth and Roman Catholic school boards, as well as Halton Region's public and Catholic boards will crowd into Hamilton Place to view Inside Hana's Suitcase, a film based on Hana Brady's life story, as well as meet her brother, George Brady.

Another 1,500 to 2,000 will gather in the evening of Oct. 4 to see the movie, meet Brady and raise funds for the United Way's Hana's Suitcase Legacy Fund, which promotes literacy programs in Hamilton, as well as for Holocaust education and human rights programs of the Hamilton Jewish federation.

The collaborative effort doesn't end there, said Gerald Fisher, executive director of UJA Federation of Hamilton. "We've done something remarkable in Hamilton. We've arranged with the Hamilton-Wentworth public and Roman Catholic schools, with the Halton regional schools and with private schools to teach a curriculum in school on Holocaust education and human rights to middle school students based on the book, Hana's Suitcase," he said.

Madeleine Levy, co-chair of the federation's Holocaust education committee, said the organization has worked in the past with Hamilton educators to run symposia to inform students about the Holocaust as well as help give teachers the tools they need to teach about the Holocaust.

"This is what we do," she said. "We had so many teachers asking how to approach social justice issues and Holocaust education in the classroom while fitting in the curriculum and promoting literacy."

In the last year, she and other volunteers put together an answer for their questions, she continued. Schools in the region were given copies of the book, by award-winning author Karen Levine, as well as a Holocaust-related curriculum created by Second Story Press, the book's publisher. In addition, reference materials for teachers were collected from the Montreal and Vancouver Holocaust education centres, and the whole package was presented in replica suitcases manufactured by a local contractor.

The materials were funded by a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation and Today's Family, a local organization involved in child education and care, partnered with the federation.

"The whole community came together for the project," Levy said. "I think it's a wonderful teaching tool for Grades five and six."

Pat Rocco, superintendent of education for Hamilton-Wentworth District School Board, said each school in the division has received one replica suitcase with materials to implement the curriculum. Teachers will use the materials to guide students in grades 5 to 8 about the Holocaust and expand on the lesson to promote the school boards' values of "tolerance and respect."

Hana's Suitcase can be a jumping off point to teach about "social justice," said Rocco – "teaching kids to be good global citizens." That includes "self-respect," "doing the right thing" and "treating others like you'd like to be treated," he said.

Rocco said the Hana's Suitcase curriculum fits nicely with other educative tools throughout the school year, such as commemorating Martin Luther King Day, a social justice fair and a film fair.

The story of Hana Brady and her suitcase was first told in The CJN in 2001. The story inspired Levine to write Hana's Suitcase, which garnered numerous intentional awards.

It tells the story of Hana and George Brady, youngsters during World War II who were sent to the Nazi concentration camp at Theresienstadt. The camp was used to fool international observers about the condition of Jews who had been rounded up and deported from their homes.

Hana and George were deported separately to Auschwitz, where Hana was killed immediately on arrival in October 1944. The suitcase in the book's title refers to the luggage she carried with her to the Nazi death camp, but which she never used.

It came to life again when Fumiko Ishioka, director of the Holocaust Education Resource Centre in Tokyo, asked the Auschwitz Museum for an artifact that might bring home to her students the reality of the Holocaust. She was sent Hana's suitcase (it later turned out to be a replica created by the museum after the original was destroyed by vandals in 1984 while being exhibited in Birmingham, England), and she used it to track down Hana's brother, George Brady, who had survived the war and started a new life in Toronto.

Brady had been unaware that his sister's suitcase still existed.

"Hana's Suitcase has brought the lessons of history and a message of tolerance to thousands of children, and will continue to do so," Brady said.

Levy believes the Hamilton federation and its partners are continuing that message.

"In the book Hana said she wanted to be a teacher. We're fulfilling that dream for her," she said.

Dershowitz opens Vancouver UJA drive

Urges community to 'dig into your pockets'

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A record crowd of 1,500 came to hear Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz's thoughts on Israel, U.S. politics, anti-Semitism and Jewish continuity at last week's opening of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's (JFGV) annual campaign.

Dershowitz said he had just returned from Israel, where he declined an offer from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to be Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

"I felt it could raise questions of dual loyalty," he told the Sept. 20 crowd at the Centre in Vancouver for the Performing Arts.

On the subject of Iran, he said the Islamic Republic is "the smartest adversary Israel and the U.S. has ever faced. They're not going to build a bomb right now. Rather, they're going to develop civilian nuclear energy. They won't make the ultimate step, because they know it crosses the red line, and Iran will try to create a situation where it crosses Israel's red line, but not the U.S.'s red line."

Iran sees the United States as being tired from its involvement in two wars, both of which are going badly, Dershowitz said. "The feeling among Iranians is that America is not going to get into a third war."

But Dershowitz's big fear, he said, was that U.S. President Barack Obama will be remembered as the Neville Chamberlain of the 21st century if he fails to prevent Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"You cannot allow a government like Iran's to have nuclear weapons," he said. "If Israel does take preventative action and attacks Iran's nuclear reactor, it will be acting within its legal rights according to Article 51 of the UN Charter, and I will defend Israel legally and morally."

Outside the doors of the Centre in Vancouver for the Performing Arts, a handful of protesters brandished signs equating Israel's policies with apartheid in South Africa. Dershowitz dismissed them angrily from the stage.

"Those people outside are not pro-Palestinian – they support the end of the peace process," he said. "As one of Nelson Mandela's lawyers, I fought against apartheid and I know what it was about. Israel is a country struggling with lots of difficult problems, but apartheid is not one of them."

Dershowitz also had plenty to say on other problems facing Israel and the Jewish People. On conversion, for example, he quipped, "I think whoever wants to carry the burden of Judaism should be allowed to carry it!"

Alan Dershowitz

Speaking more seriously, he noted that the policy of matriarchal descent in Judaism grew out of the Middle Ages and was adopted to protect Jewish women and children. "I don't think that matriarchal descent policy is critical today," he said. "Israel is a place of sanctuary, and I'd like to see the issue of conversion and who is Jewish taken out of the realm of religion."

On assimilation, he argued that the Jewish community must treat intermarried couples differently. "We have to make it much easier for intermarried couples to become Jewish by welcoming the non-Jewish spouses to our communities, federations and cultural events. We have to welcome their children and make Judaism so exciting and attractive that they want to be a part of it," he said.

Assimilation is inevitable, he added, and the "guilt business" isn't enough to keep Jews in the fold. "We have to think progressively, adapt, change and stay ahead of the curve when it comes to how we deal with change in our community."

The JFGV's fundraising goal this year is $8 million, $2.4 million of which has been raised so far.

Dershowitz ended with a plea.

"A strong, thriving Jewish community, built around tzedakah and tzedek, a community that knows its responsibilities and gives generously, is an essential weapon in Israel's need to defend itself," he said. "Please, dig into your pockets. We owe it to our grandparents and our grandchildren to keep our community strong."

Engineer helps to rebuild Haiti

Quebec civil engineer helps fulfil tikkun olam

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Earlier this year, David Tordjman's biggest professional concern was making sure a home composting program was running smoothly in Côte St. Luc.

Since March, the city's former director of public works and urban planning has been in Haiti working on the rebuilding of the country after January's devastating earthquake.

A civil engineer by profession, Tordjman, 38, is a project manager for UNOPS (United Nations Office of Project Services), engaged primarily in determining the soundness of buildings.

It's a far cry from the five years he spent working for a well-to-do suburb overseeing the daily operations of garbage collection, road construction and snow removal.

"Haiti puts things in perspective. Here, if a water main broke, people complained their water was off for an hour. People in Haiti are just grateful for basic services," said Tordjman who was back in Montreal for the High Holidays.

When he first arrived in Haiti, running water was a sometimes thing and there is still no refuse pickup.

After the earthquake, Tordjman immediately offered to volunteer in Haiti, realizing he had needed skills. He scheduled two weeks vacation and booked a flight, but with the chaotic situation on the ground his services were not required at that point.

Montrealer David Tordjman, right, a UN project manager in Haiti, confers with a local colleague at a work site.

He then contacted the UN, among other organizations, and the UN said they needed a French-speaking engineer with experience in public works and dealing with government – right away.

It was a difficult decision, but with his wife Stephanie's blessing, Tordjman resigned from his job and said goodbye to her and their three children aged 10, 7 and 5. "I'm a firm believer that things are meant to be, and that I was meant to do this work."

As an observant Jew, living in Haiti has other challenges. Tordjman wears a kippah at all times. "When I first arrived they thought I was a cardinal," he said.

When they found out he was Jewish, the Haitians were intrigued, but not mystified. "They had some basic knowledge and I met a few who thought the Haitians were descended from the Lost Tribes. They are a very religious people, and ask questions."

He returns from his home visits with a couple of suitcases full of kosher meat and other food. Otherwise, he eats a lot of fish and vegetables. "I've lost 20 pounds, but I could stand it." It's also been brutally hot, and the work gruelling.

Tordjman has worked abroad before and had some experience roughing it as a reservist in the Canadian Armed Forces, but he had never been in a disaster zone.

"Even almost two months after the quake, it was a scene of devastation when I arrived, with demolished buildings and the number of people in the camps and on the streets. And the odor and dust was overwhelming. It was depressing initially.

"I looked around and thought 'Where am I going to start?'"

He was soon impressed with the "incredible" resiliency of the Haitians and the eagerness of public officials to move forward.

Tordjman is based in the capital, Port-au-Prince, with occasional forays to Jacmel and Leogne, and co-ordinates with the public works ministry.

The first job he oversaw was clearing canals of debris, an emergency operation to prevent the refugee camps from flooding. His team removed some 100,000 cubic metres of material.

To date, his team has evaluated 250,000 buildings, a number which is expected to climb to 400,000 in the next few months.

Tordjman is the only Canadian on the project, and works alongside people from Europe, Australia, Pakistan and other countries. He has hired 400 local engineers and trained them in United States building code standards.

Of the buildings inspected so far, about half are safe to return to, a quarter need repair and the rest need major work or have to be razed.

Because there is so much to be done, Tordjman said his assignment may stretch to 18 months or even two years. It is a sacrifice with a young family back in Côte St. Luc, but he would not relocate them to Haiti because it is not safe and there is no Jewish community or school, he said.

There are a small number of Jews working in Haiti, mainly with non-governmental organizations from North America and Israel, including the American-Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, as well as 10 Israel police officers, who occasionally get together for a Shabbat dinner or holiday, he said.

His living conditions are quite comfortable. The UN staff live in a walled and guarded compound in a better part of Port-au-Prince, and he shares an apartment with a colleague.

Tordjman brings to his task a sense of fulfilling his obligation as a Jew.

"This is more than a job," he said. "I think I'm teaching my children a lot through this about tikkun olam (the Jewish value of repairing the world). In the midst of the High Holidays, a time of introspection, I realize more than ever what is important in life, and that we need to do good."

Tordjman has been involved with Quebec Jewish Congress and other Jewish organizations, but had little experience of helping others outside his community before now.

His long-term goal is to enable the Haitians to take charge of the reconstruction themselves over the long term, by which he means at least 10 years. "I think for the most part they appreciate outside help, but not so much the handouts as a hand up."

"I think this is an opportunity for Haiti to bring itself out of the spiral of desperation, whether political or natural. This is its one chance to get out of that cycle, if things are done right. Good can ultimately come from this disaster, but it will take a good 10 years."

CJC comes to defence of Le Droit cartoonist

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress has come to the defence of an Ottawa editorial cartoonist who Congress officials say was wrongfully targeted as anti-Semitic by B'nai Brith Canada.

In a Sept. 20 cartoon for Le Droit, a Gatineau-area publication owned by Cyberpresse – the parent company of Montreal's La Presse newspaper – longtime political cartoonist Guy Badeaux, a.k.a. "Bado," drew an image of Parliament Hill with the Peace Tower in the background and what appeared to be a Star of David in the centre of its clock face.

The French caption on the cartoon reads "Parliament returns," and there's a traffic sign on the lawn whose pictogram signifies a slippery road ahead.

(The tower does indeed have a star-like pattern on its clock face that resembles the Star of David.)

In a Sept. 21 statement, Moïse Moghrabi, chair of B'nai Brith Canada's Quebec region of the League for Human Rights, called the drawing "vicious and baseless," and based on "age-old stereotypes of a Jewish conspiracy of control" of government.

He added: "This cartoon does not comment on any issue of significance. It simply serves to raise public resentment against the Jewish community. We find it regrettable and shameful that a respectable newspaper would promote such harmful canards. This cartoon is an attack on the Jewish community in Canada."

Speaking to CBC News, Badeaux said he never meant to draw a Star of David, but rather was trying to draw a simplified version of the design on the Peace Tower's clock face.

In an interview with The CJN last week, Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber said his organization has worked "very closely" with Badeaux over the years and called him "pro-Jewish and a philo-Semite."

Farber was incensed that B'nai Brith did not seemingly "check all the facts" about Badeaux and decided to label him an anti-Semite "when he clearly isn't. We have to set the record straight."

"It's inconceivable to me that one would attack a person [this way]. It's a form of character assassination. The [Jewish] community should not involve ourselves in it. Not everything is anti-Semitic. When things are anti-Semitic, we call it what it is, and when it isn't, we have to stand up and say so."

A Quebec Jewish Congress official also came to the defence of Badeaux, whom he said he has known for a long time and considers a friend of the Jewish community.

Daniel Amar, QJC's regional executive director, said he spoke to Badeaux last week and accepted his explanation that the six-pointed star he drew is a stylized sketch of the actual pattern on the clock face.

"It has nothing to do with Jews or Israel, or whether they are influencing the government," Amar said. "Each time he draws [the tower], he makes the clock like that, and I have examples… This is really a tempest in a teapot."

Amar noted that last year, Badeaux participated in a panel at in an international exhibition in Montreal, called Cartooning for Peace, that was conceived by French cartoonist Jean Plantu and Israeli cartoonist Michel Kichka, and co-organized by QJC and the Action Week Against Racism.

Amar said Badeaux had communicated that he was very upset at being falsely labelled anti-Semitic.

"Who wouldn't be upset? The cartoon description [by B'nai Brith] is pretty harsh. But Badeaux is relieved that we're standing up for him as a friend," Amar said.

Despite both Badeaux's and Congress' claims that the cartoon was innocuous, a Sept. 22 statement by B'nai Brith re-iterated the organization's belief that it was aimed at the Jewish community.

"The artist's claim that he was merely 'attempting to draw the design of the Peace Tower' is not acceptable. It is his responsibility and the responsibility of the Cyberpresse group to pull the cartoon and issue an apology. The cartoon is offensive has no place in a respectable newspaper such as La Presse," Moghrabi said.

When asked if B'nai Brith had researched Badeaux's history and association with the Jewish community before making its charge, Heidi Oppen, the organization's Quebec regional director, told The CJN that B'nai Brith had not contacted Badeaux, but that it's aware of his background and Congress' stance.

Regardless, she said her organization wants Badeaux to issue an apology for his "unacceptable" drawing.

Future of Middle East peace talks undecided

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said that there will be no quick decision on whether the PA pulls out of Mideast peace talks now that an Israeli moratorium on West Bank settlement construction has ended.

"We will not have swift reactions now, to say 'yes' or 'no – we want, or we don't want,'" Abbas told a press conference in Paris on Monday, where he met with French President Nicholas Sarkozy.

Abbas said in Paris that he will consult with the 22-member Arab League on Oct. 4 on how to proceed.

"After this chain of meetings, we might publish a position that clears up the position of the Palestinian and Arab people after Israel has refused to freeze settlements," he said.

Abbas has repeatedly said Palestinians would quit newly relaunched peace talks if Israel resumes settlement activity. A 10-month slowdown on construction expired on Sept. 26, and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu says he will not renew the order.

Monday's comments signalled that the Palestinians are giving U.S. mediators more time to reach a compromise.

Sarkozy said on Monday he would ask Abbas, Netanyahu and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to peace talks in Paris before the end of October.

Abbas said the construction of settlements should be frozen for another three to four months, a position Sarkozy backed as crucial.

"The settlements must stop," the French president said.

Last-ditch negotiations continued well into the early hours of Monday morning as Israeli, Palestinian and American leaders attempted to save Middle East peace talks from an early collapse.

Netanyahu spoke twice by telephone with U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as West Bank settlers prepared to restart construction after a 10-month Israeli moratorium expired on Sunday.

Abbas has repeatedly vowed to walk out of talks, which began a month ago in Washington, if building resumes. But Netanyahu remains hopeful of keeping the peace process alive.

"Israel is ready to retain continual contacts [with the Palestinians] over the coming days to find a way to advance peace negotiations," Netanyahu said.

The prime minister, who has faced heavy pressure from Likud party colleagues and right-wing coalition partners to end the freeze, which covered the entire West Bank excluding east Jerusalem, also spoke with Mubarak and Jordan's King Abdullah II, assuring them that he was striving to maintain the talks.

"I call on President Abbas to continue the frank and fruitful dialogue that has only just begun, with the goal of reaching an historic peace agreement between our nations," Netanyahu said in a statement late Sunday.

"I hope that President Abbas will remain in the talks and continue with me on the path of peace, on which we set out two weeks ago, with many across the world now convinced that my intention to secure peace is serious and honest and that I honour my obligations."

Building work at the West Bank settlement of Ariel restarted Monday morning.

Jewish West Bank residents currently have plans for around 2,000 new homes across the West Bank. Of these, some 600 have up-to-date paperwork and are expected to be completed in the coming months.

After the Sukkot holiday, the Yesha Council of settlements and local West Bank councils are expected to pressure Netanyahu into approving new construction.

The number of housing units put up in the West Bank during the Netanyahu government is the lowest under any prime minister since the first Rabin government.

Israel calls on UN to end 'obsessively biased' Gaza war probe

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's treatment of Palestinians has been a prime target for the UN Human Rights Council, where Islamic countries and their allies have a built-in majority since its launch in 2006.

On Monday, Israel called for an end to the council's investigations into its actions in the 2008-09 Gaza conflict, insisting that the body is "obsessively biased" against it.

But in discussion at the 47-nation council of a report from a UN fact-finding mission on the fighting, Islamic countries and their allies said pressure had to be kept on the Israelis to make them halt "aggression" in the region.

The military action in late December 2008 and early January 2009 against the enclave controlled by Hamas Islamists came "in response to years of attacks by Hamas terrorists," said Israel's ambassador to the United Nations Aharon Leshno Yaar.

The stance of the council, he declared, "has continually been one-sided and obsessively biased... It did not matter that steps were taken by Israel to protect its citizens while limiting damage whenever possible to Palestinian civilians."

During the Gaza fighting, more than 1,400 Palestinians and 13 Israelis died after Israel sent troops into the enclave between Israel and Egypt in what it said was an attempt to halt Hamas rocket fire on its towns near the border.

The UN report, released last week, said investigations by both Israel and the Palestinians into violations of human rights in the conflict were inadequate. It also criticized Israel for refusing to co-operate with the mission.

Leshno Yaar told the council Israel had launched its own independent investigation into how far it had looked into the behaviour of its forces in Gaza and whether its legal system would be able to deal with any complaints of excessive violence.

"Given these processes and Israel's significant efforts, it is time to bring activities from this hall to a conclusion," the ambassador said. This would allow the council to focus on seeking out true human rights failures in the world, he added.

In Monday's debate, member countries of the 57-nation Organization of the Islamic Conference insisted that the council and the UN General Assembly in New York must continue to focus on the Gaza operation and its aftermath.

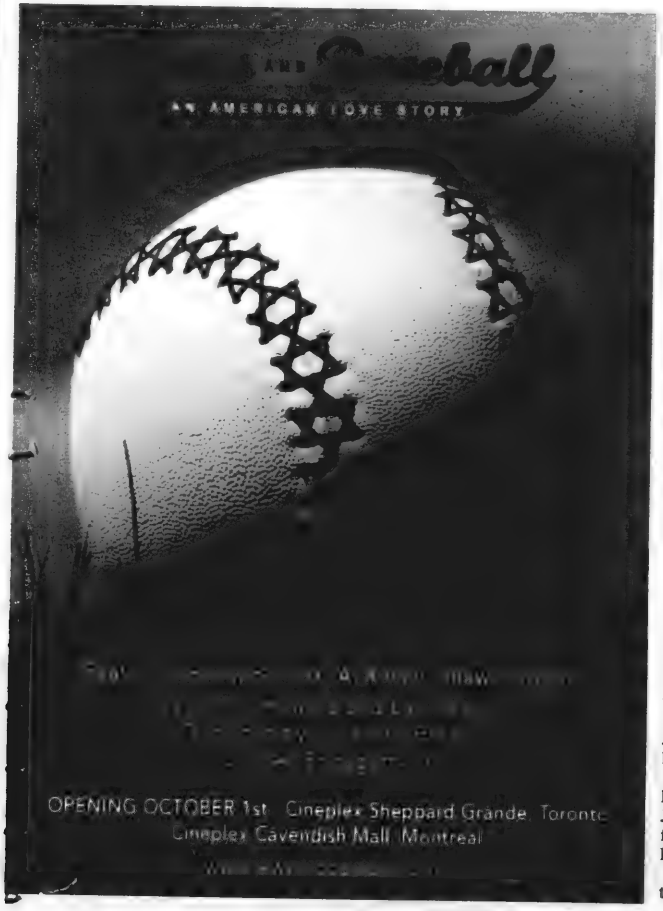
"Israel must put an end to its culture of violence... and show a new face to the world," Turkey told the human rights body.

The UN mission's report centred on how the two sides of the Gaza conflict had responded to a UN call to investigate allegations of war crimes and rights violations.

That call had come in the report of a fact-finding mission last year led by South African jurist Richard Goldstone.

The Goldstone report found that both the Israeli army and Hamas were guilty of war crimes in the conflict, but focused mainly on violations by Israel, which rejected its findings.

In a separate matter being discussed alongside the Gaza conflict question, UN experts said last week that a May attack by Israeli commandos on a Gaza-bound aid flotilla was unlawful and resulted in violations of human rights and international humanitarian law.



New U.K. Labour leader says he won't 'lurch left'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Britain's newly appointed opposition leader, Ed Miliband, insisted Sunday that he won't move his Labour Party toward the political left after he harnessed the support of leftist unions to beat his better-known brother in a dramatic party vote.

Miliband, 40, narrowly defeated his brother David, the 45-year-old ex-foreign secretary, in their party's leadership contest on Saturday, winning a slender majority of 1.3 per cent of votes.

Critics have already dubbed Miliband "Red Ed," claiming he's likely to shift his party away from the centrist, business-friendly platform of former prime ministers Tony Blair and Gordon Brown.

"I am nobody's man. I am my own man. I am very clear about that," Miliband told BBC television Sunday, in his first interview as party leader, insisting he would not be beholden to his labour union backers.

He said his leadership won't see a turn to the left, but insisted his party must break decisively from the dogma of Blair and Brown and lay to rest divisive arguments over the decision to back the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq.

Ed Miliband

"It is not about some lurch to the left – absolutely not. I am for the centre ground of politics," said Miliband, who was confirmed as leader at a rally in Manchester in northern England.

MPs, party activists and about 3.5 million unionists voted in the contest.

The Miliband brothers are the sons of Jewish immigrants to Britain whose family lost about 80 members in the Holocaust.

Their mother is Polish-born Marion Kozek, a leading member of the Jews for Justice for Palestinians group. Their late father was Belgian-born Marxist intellectual Ralph Miliband.

In his campaign, Ed Miliband advocated the retention of a temporary 50 per cent tax rate for high earners, a more punishing levy on banks and a steep rise in the country's minimum wage.

He said he favours tax hikes in place of some proposed public spending cuts, but he told the BBC on Sunday that he won't oppose all austerity measures being put forward by Prime Minister David Cameron's minority government.

"I'm not going to oppose every cut that the coalition government comes up with. I will judge them on their merits," Miliband said.

But he questioned the speed of Cameron's plans to restore Britain's finances, saying the aim of saving 30 billion pounds ($44 billion) per year from government departments is reckless.

Miliband – whose partner, Justine Thornton, is pregnant with the couple's second child – has pledged action to reduce the gap between the country's highest and lowest earners, and to offer better protection to British workers who face competition for jobs from migrants.

However, he insisted his policies would have broad appeal. "All these characterizations about 'Red Ed' are both tiresome and also rubbish," he said.

Writing an op-ed article in the Sunday Telegraph newspaper, Miliband vowed to recapture the support of middle class Britons, who deserted the party in the May national election, when Labour trailed in second place and was ousted after 13 years in office by the Conservative-led coalition government.

"My aim is to show that our party is on the side of the squeezed middle in our country and everyone who has worked hard and wants to get on," he wrote.

Miliband said his brother is considering whether he would take a portfolio in Labour's new top team. "He needs time to think about the contribution he can make. I think he can make a very big contribution to British politics," the new leader said.

Peres, Harper meet in New York

"This regime," he said of Israel, "which enjoys the absolute support of some western countries, regularly threatens the countries in the region and continues publicly announced assassinations of Palestinian figures and others, while Palestinian defenders are labelled as terrorists and anti-Semites.

"All values, even the freedom of expression in Europe and the United States, are being sacrificed at the altar of Zionism."

The Canadian delegation walked out of Ahmadinejad's speech, as did the U.S., all 27 European Union delegations, along with New Zealand, Australia and Costa Rica, according to reports.

In related news, Prime Minister Stephen Harper, who also attended the Millennium Development summit, met with Israeli President Shimon Peres last Thursday morning prior to Harper's address to the UN General Assembly.

According to a statement from the Prime Minister's Office, in their meeting, Harper and Peres "recognized the close relationship and deep friendship between Canada and Israel," with Peres emphasizing "Israel's deepest thanks and appreciation for Canada's continued support and encouragement of Israel, noting, 'We know we are not alone.'"

Later, Harper told the assembly that Canada is "encouraged by the resumption of direct talks between Israel and the Palestinian Authority. Canada sincerely hopes the talks will succeed and will continue to help the Palestinian Authority build its institutions."

He also reminded the UN that Canada is now eligible to serve on its Security Council and made a pitch for the country's inclusion on the council.

"If we are elected, we will be ready to serve. And, if called upon to serve on the Security Council, Canada will be informed by… [the UN's] foundational beliefs in the sovereign equality of countries… of the obligation to settle disputes peacefully… and [upholding] the human rights of all people."

He added that if elected to the Security Council, Canada would "strive to further" those ideals "just as we have striven to implement Security Council resolutions."

Most recently, the council passed sanctions against Iran to try to limit its ability to acquire nuclear weapons.

The UN Security Council has five permanent members – China, France, Russia, the United Kingdom and the United States – and 10 non-permanent members, each with two-year terms.

These 10 spots are currently held by Austria, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Brazil, Gabon, Japan, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, Turkey and Uganda.

At last week's summit, Harper also pledged $540 million to the Global Fund to Fight AIDS, Tuberculosis and Malaria over the next three years.

Iran's nuclear agency battles computer virus

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iranian media reports said Friday that the country's nuclear agency is trying to combat a complex computer worm that has affected industrial sites in Iran and is capable of taking over power plants.

The computer virus, which attacks a widely used industrial system, appears aimed mostly at Iran and its sophistication suggests a state may have been involved in creating it, western cyber security companies said earlier in the day.

Kevin Hogan, senior director of Security Response at Symantec, told Reuters 60 per cent of the computers worldwide infected by the so-called Stuxnet worm were in Iran, indicating industrial plants in that country were the target.

Israel Briefs

Ariel Sharon going home

Ariel Sharon, who has been in a coma for nearly five years, is expected to be moved from an Israeli hospital to his Negev ranch. The former Israeli prime minister, 82, who suffered a stroke on Jan. 6, 2006, that left him comatose, will be moved within the next few weeks from the Sheba Medical Center at Tel Hashomer in Tel Aviv to his home for a trial period, Yediot Achronot reported last Wednesday. If the trial is successful, Sharon reportedly will be taken back permanently to the ranch, which has been equipped with the necessary medical equipment and access to his second-floor bedroom, the newspaper reported. Sharon's sons, Gilad and Omri, reportedly requested the move.

Israel ready to talk with Syria

Israel is ready to enter peace negotiations with Syria "right away," Shimon Peres told the United Nations General Assembly. Peres also said he believed that a two-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is the only "peaceful alternative." He added: "And I believe that we shall succeed." Peres offered to share Israeli technological advances with other nations, including countries without diplomatic ties to Israel.

Crystal a Hebrew U benefactor

Actor Billy Crystal has made a substantial gift to the Hebrew University in Jerusalem to foster activities in a performing arts project named for him. The gift, announced in a news release by the American Friends of the Hebrew University, will be used to create and present workshops, programs and theatrical performances at the university that bring Jews and Arabs together as a means to promote tolerance and improved cultural and social understanding. The organization said the gift would endow the Billy Crystal Peace through the Performing Arts project so that it could run in perpetuity.

Web comic about two roommates includes fantasy and reality

By Rita Poliakov
Staff Reporter

Dan Simon has never actually fought a moving vehicle before.

But his alter ego has.

He's also helped tame a giant breast that terrorized his city, watched two girls have a light-sabre fight over him and farted. A lot.

Simon, 30, along with his friend Jeff Moss, 30, is the co-creator of No Reason Comics, a web comic series about two roommates living their daily lives. And a little bit of their fantasy lives, too.

The roommates, Jamie Goldbergsteinowitz – the most Jewish name the friends could think of, and his slightly more quirky friend, Murph O'Murphy, are loosely based on Simon and Moss. While most plotlines revolve around everyday stories, such as strange conversations at grocery stores and online dating, some tend to verge on the extraodinary.

"[Jamie and Murph] are both sort of your atypical, late 20-something guys with zero boundaries. They can do anything. They try and build giant doomsday devices, you know. Jamie fights cars from time to time," said Simon, who draws the characters.

Murph O'Murphy, left, and Jamie Goldbergsteinowitz from No Reason Comics are loosely based on their creators, Jeff Moss and Dan Simon.

"Jamie is probably more of the straight man, whereas Murph is far more oblivious to reality. He tends to live in his own little world."

Simon and Moss, who writes the comics, have known each other since they were about 14. The friends grew up on a diet of comics and more comics, and, a few years ago, decided to go from appreciating to creating the art.

"From the time I could read, I've been reading Archie comics and Superman comics that my mother would thrust upon me to shut me up in the grocery store," said Moss, who left Toronto last year to open up the 4th Wall, a comic book store in Montreal.

While Moss was reading superhero comics, Simon delved into comics like Calvin and Hobbes.

"That's what I grew up on. [Moss] was reading X-Men, and I was reading [Calvin and Hobbes]. It would be from reading the comics on Saturday, and just the Toronto Star," said Simon, who along with reading comic books, always enjoyed drawing.

"I started out with superheros, trying to draw family members. I started out by tracing comic covers, trying to draw faces and stuff."

Simon ended up getting a bachelor's in fine arts from York University. He's currently a freelance graphic designer and art director.

Some four years ago, while at the cottage, Simon proposed an idea that Moss couldn't pass up.

"[Simon] had started getting into web comics. He said, 'Why don't we give this a shot.' I'm lazy and cheap and said, 'Sure, let's do it.' We were sitting on the docks, shooting the shit, and from that evolved Jamie and Murph... They're sort of like us, with the volume turned way up."

No Reason Comics started with a strip about Murph making fun of Jamie's teddy bear. And then it began to evolve.

"If you look at the first strip, versus where the strips are at now... it's an evolutionary process," Simon said. "It took a year and a half to two years to get to the point where I was comfortable to draw them quickly and cleanly."

Moss and Simon's readership has evolved as well, from 100 viewers in the first few months to 50,000 to 100,000 a month.

"The cartoons were just fun and easy. By web comic standards, we're probably the high-end of the middle of the road. We're not one of the big ones," Simon said.

For both friends, creating each strip is a balance.

"Communicating effectively visually, that's the key. You can have good writing, but if you have artwork that can't convey it, the joke falls flat," Simon said.

Moss agrees.

"He and I know each other well enough that we're fairly inside of each other's heads. I can write a passage like Jamie and Murph are on the couch, Murph's drinking a soda, playing a video game, and Dan will know how to translate that," he said.

"When I'm writing, I have an idea of what it will look like. It's a cool little synergy we've developed over the years."

While some plotlines are fictional, others are taken from bizarre events or strange conversations in Moss and Simon's daily lives.

"One [comic] in the first year had Murph and Jamie driving and stuck in traffic. Jamie says, 'Take a look at these clowns.' And it shows two clowns arguing with each other. They had hit each other. That really happened," Moss said.

The friends are currently working on a print version of the comic, called Why Are You Naked?, which should be released in the next few months.

"We don't know when to quit," Simon said.

"There's been a couple of times when both of us have thought that we have better things to do, but neither of us would be the first one to step away from it."

Moss agrees.

"This strip will go on as long as Dan will keep drawing it. Even if I go on and do a zillion other things, I'll still be writing No Reason. It's truly a labour of love," he said.

I Musici to play Mooredale Concerts season opener

By HEATHER SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Why has it taken Montreal maestro Yuli Turovsky four years to get back to Toronto, where his chamber orchestra I Musici will play the Mooredale Concerts' 22nd season opener on Oct. 3.

It's because he and I Musici have been all over the world in the meantime, including a tour of China last October that covered seven cities with seven new concert halls. He was amazed.

Yuli Turovsky

"I myself am from a Communist country and I came to Canada [in 1977] because I was not a big fan of the Communist system, and I still am not. But one can't deny the efficiency of the Chinese in being able to develop the economy in this way. If they decide to do something, they don't discuss it for 25 years," says the Moscow-born musician, referring to the bureaucracy that held up a new hall for the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, with which he has soloed on cello.

Turovsky didn't let discussion get in his way when, in 1983, he wanted to establish I Musici de Montreal, the 15-member string orchestra that shot to world renown under his baton. "I played in the Moscow Chamber Orchestra for many years and when I came here and wanted to start my own chamber orchestra, all my new friends who knew local life told me it was absolutely impossible. They said I couldn't do it without a solid financial foundation and mine was close to zero! However, I thought that maybe I, without having this [preconception] about money, could do something," he says.

Radio-Canada, which knew him as a member of the Borodin Trio that he co-founded after he left the Soviet Union, agreed to a series of recordings by the newborn I Musici. The albums served as a promotional tool when Turovsky approached the Chandos label, his recording company in England and soon I Musici was in demand. Today, the eight violinists, three violas, two cellos and one double bass conducted by Turovsky boast over 50 CDs and play more than 100 concerts annually.

Anton Kuerti, a pianist who directs the Mooredale series, has been guest soloist with I Musici on many occasions. When Turovsky was artistic director of the Orford International Music Festival, Kuerti was often featured.

The soloist with I Musici for their Toronto appearance will be Katherine Chi (pronounced "chee"), one of Canada's best pianists, who will join the orchestra in Turina's Mediterranean-flavoured Rapsodia Sinfonica, op. 66.

I Musici starts the program with Elgar's nostalgic Serenade, op. 20, and devotes the second half of the concert to Tchaikovsky's initially tragic, then uplifting Serenade for Strings.

Before the main concert, I Musici and Chi are to play for youngsters aged five to 15 as part of the children's Music & Truffles series. "It's interactive, and we will ask kids what they think of a particular piece," says Turovsky, "I remember we once asked a young audience what they thought of when they listened to some sad music that we played. One boy said, 'I think of my dog that died.' When I asked him about his dog, he said, 'I don't have a dog but if I had, and if the dog died, I'd feel like this!'"

The beauty of music is that it can conjure mind pictures as real as that. On tour, a popular I Musici offering is Mussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, a piano suite transcribed for strings by Turovsky. Mussorgsky wrote it after seeing the memorial exhibition of his artist friend Viktor Hartmann, who died tragically in 1873 at 39, but though the music came down to us, the paintings were swallowed up by political upheavals. Turovsky had his artist-violinist daughter, Natasha, paint 15 huge canvases inspired by the music, in an effort to reconstruct the emotion of the original paintings.

Since the orchestra can't tour with them, Turovsky had a filmmaker create a digital montage of segments from the artworks, moving on a backdrop screen to the rhythm of the melody. "We call it choreographed paintings, and we have plans to continue this with Tchaikovsky and Prokofiev," he says.

I Musici's Montreal subscription series further demonstrates Turovsky's willingness to reach out to other forms of the arts, even within the realm of music. His classical orchestra teams up with Kleztory on Dec. 9 for a combination klezmer-classical evening. On Oct. 25, I Musici comes under the baton of the celebrated Maxim Vengerov for a concert gala.

It is Turovsky's belief that the future of I Musici and classical music in general can be fostered through the involvement of youth. In fact, I Musici's final concert of the Montreal season is titled Next Generation, featuring mostly students of Turovsky and his violinist wife, Eleonora, who is concertmaster of I Musici and his partner in the Turovsky Duo. For Montreal concert tickets, visit www.imusici.com or 514-982-6038.

"Toronto and Montreal are Canada's two main cultural centres, and they have a lot to offer each other," says Turovsky, "The more we exchange, the better."

Tickets for the Mooredale Concert, which takes place at Walter Hall, Edward Johnson Building, 80 Queen's Park Cres., are available by visiting www.mooredaleconcerts.com or calling 416-587-9411.

Yuli Turovsky surrounds himself with terrific players.

JEWISH BOOK FAIR

More than 25 Canadian and international authors are featured at the 34th annual Toronto Jewish Book Fair, presented by the Koffler Centre of the Arts in a new location at Beth David Synagogue, 55 Yeomans Rd.

Israeli author and peace activist David Grossman opens the fair with a reading from his new novel, To the End of the Land, Saturday, Oct. 23.

Closing the fair on Sunday, Oct. 31, is writer-broadcaster Tarek Fatah, author of the provocative new title, The Jew is Not My Enemy: Unveiling the Myths that Fuel Muslim Anti-Semitism. Fatah, a founder of the Muslim Canadian Congress, argues that anti-Semitism contradicts the essence of the Islamic spirit and suggests a way to eliminate the agonizing friction between Jewish and Muslim communities.

In her new book The Ghosts of Europe, Hungarian-born Anna Porter returns to her European roots where she found disquieting signs of old hatreds and racial tensions. Her talk is scheduled for Wednesday, Oct. 27. American writer George Gilder presents his new book The Israel Test, where he makes the case for Israel as the crucial battlefield for capitalism and freedom, Sunday, Oct. 24.

Other presenters include Harold Troper, author of The Defining Decade; David Brody, author of Mourning and Celebration – Jewish, Orthodox and Gay Past and Present; Lynda Fishman, author of Repairing Rainbows: A True Story of Family; Bill Gladstone, speaking on The Rise of the Toronto Jewish Community; Gregory Levey, author of How to Make Peace in the Middle East in Six Months or Less Without Leaving Your Apartment; Kate Taylor, author of A Man in Uniform; Judie Oron, author of Cry of the Giraffe; Savyon Liebrecht, author of The Women My Father Knew; Joseph Kertes, author of Gratitude; Kitty Wintrob, author of I'm Not Going Back, and many more.

Montreal Cellist to Play Here: "He could make me happy just by playing scales," the San Antonio Star once commented about Yuli Turovsky, cellist and conductor of the I Musici de Montreal Chamber Orchestra.

A Moscow-born Jew who came to Canada 25 years ago, Turovsky was a serious cellist by the age of seven and has participated in many world tours with the Moscow Chamber Orchestra. After moving to Montreal, Turovsky formed the Turovsky Duo with his wife Eleonora and co-founded the Borodine Trio. He also teaches at the Faculté de musique of the Université de Montréal.

An ensemble of 15 strings, I Musici de Montréal Chamber Orchestra plays a repertoire that extends from the baroque to the contemporary at more than 100 concerts each year. Turovsky and orchestra open the new season of Mooredale Concerts. MacMillan Theatre, Edward Johnson Building, 80 Queen's Park Cres. Sunday, Oct. 3, 3:15 p.m. www.mooredaleconcerts.com

Last chance to catch book reviewer perform

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Robert Adams is closing the chapter on his critically acclaimed series of live book reviews he's been delivering to sold-out halls in Toronto and Montreal.

Adams will review The Elegance of the Hedgehog by Muriel Barbery at University of Toronto's Hart House next week and then return for one final performance, a free review of Elie Wiesel's The Forgotten, Nov. 2 at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue during Holocaust Education Week.

"This will be my swan song," Adams, 73, a retired English teacher and book critic, says. "It's taken up more time than I wanted to give to it."

"It" can best be described as a concert performance. He appears on stage to applause, then proceeds to deliver an informative and entertaining lecture on a book of his choosing for 90 minutes. He even comes out for an encore, a question and answer period.

Last spring after I saw him lecture on Moshin Hamid's The Reluctant Fundamentalist, I immediately went out and bought the book.

"I've taken a straw poll and found that half the people who attend have read the book beforehand and the other half come before they've read the book," he says.

Adams reviews each book in great detail, discussing its origins and geography. He is entertaining to watch and not above making a few jokes. Last spring, he started off by saying that his lectures were now available for download on iTunes, "in case any of you actually know what that means."

Some people in the audience took out notebooks and started taking notes. It felt a little like being back in school. For a minute, I was worried he might actually start asking us questions.

So why do so many people pay money to see a grey-haired man in his 70s talking to them about a book they may or may not have read?

"I often think about that," he says. "Reading is by definition a solitary occupation that people do alone. I think they enjoy the social dimension of getting together and meeting people who share the same interests."

Adams does a lot of preparation in advance of his lectures. "I make sure I've read everything the writer [I'm lecturing on] has written."

He will often interview the author beforehand as well. "I do a question and answer period at the end and I don't want anybody to catch me out," he says.

"Luckily, this time it's only her second novel," he says of Barbery, the author of The Elegance of the Hedgehog, a book about a Parisian philosophy professor who works as a concierge.

Robert Adams

"It's been a bestseller in Europe and sold over two million copies in France," he says of the book, which is a critique of the French class system. "[The main character] has to disguise the fact that she's brilliant, or she will lose her job. She has to play her part in fulfilling the stereotype of a Parisian concierge."

He said he read the book because he was interested in its philosophy. "Also I wanted to find out why a novel that attacks the French class structure is so popular there."

This series (which he'll repeat in Montreal) will be his last ticketed event. He'll finish up with his free review of Wiesel's The Forgotten, which he says moved him profoundly when he first read it. "All his works are great, but I like The Forgotten the best. Plus I think it's most appropriate for Holocaust Education Week."

As much as he has loved doing this for over 25 years, Adams feels the time is right to call it a day. "It's become a heavy burden for me and for my wife [Pearl, who is his manager]. We've decided this will be positively my last appearance."

He will still continue to deliver his reviews on cruise trips, something he started doing a few years ago.

"'Positively my last appearance,' does not apply to cruises," he says. "I will be cruising on Crystal Cruise Lines as long as they want me."

Adams will review The Elegance of the Hedgehog at Hart House Theatre, University of Toronto on Oct. 5 at 8 p.m. and Oct. 6 at 2 p.m. Tickets ($35) are available at the University of Toronto Box Office, 416-978-8849 or www.uofttix.ca.

He will review The Forgotten at a free event on Nov.2 at 7:30 p.m. at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St. Toronto. 416-633-3838.

In the Big-Inning: Jews and Baseball

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For Jewish Americans, baseball has not only been an all-American game and national pastime, but a path toward integration and acceptance.

This is the theme of Jews and Baseball: An American Love Story, which opens in Toronto at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande theatre on Oct. 1.

An absorbing film directed by Peter Miller, produced by William Hechter, written by Ira Berkow and narrated by Dustin Hoffman, Jews and Baseball is billed as the first major documentary on this theme.

The stereotypical view is that Jews don't excel in sports, but nothing can be further from the truth, especially in baseball. There have been an unbroken string of professional Jewish baseball players, from Lipman Pike (1845-1893) in the 19th century to Kevin Youkilis today.

And as sportswriter Maury Allen jokes, baseball has its origins in the Bible, "In the big inning…"

Humour aside, Jewish players, some of whom rose to stardom, have been an integral part of the game since the start.

Abraham Cahan, the legendary editor of the Jewish Daily Forward, wrote that baseball was a good way for Jewish boys to assimilate into American society.

Baseball was indeed a great leveller, but there was a dark side, too.

Some Jewish players, fearing anti-Semitism from fans, anglicized their names. Still others, such as Henry (Hank) Greenberg, perhaps the greatest Jewish player in the history of the sport, proudly retained their surnames.

Greenberg, who famously declined to play on Yom Kippur during a pennant race, paid a price for his refusal to obscure his Jewishness.

Racists mercilessly taunted him, but he remained unbowed. "It was a spur to make me do better," he says.

Greenberg led the Detroit Tigers to the World Series in 1934 and 1935, when anti-Semitism was on the rise in the United States and Europe.

Named the American League's most valuable player in 1935 and 1940, he chased Babe Ruth's home run record in 1938, coming within two homers of equalling it. Seven decades on, some observers believe that Greenberg could have surpassed Ruth's record of 60 home runs had he not been Jewish. They base their theory on the assumption that Greenberg could have done so had opposing pitchers been more co-operative. Greenberg's son, however, questions that hypothesis.

Apart from showcasing Greenberg's fabulous career, the film focuses on a number of other Jewish players.

Andy Cohen, the first Jew recruited by the manager of the New York Giants, John McGraw, fizzled soon after his debut, breaking his leg in 1929 and never returning to the major leagues.

Moe Berg, a lawyer by training and a so-so player, established a reputation as a spy for the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency during World War II.

Al Rosen, the third baseman of the Cleveland Indians, led the league in home runs in 1953 and made the all-star team four years in a row. But the Indians' general manager, Hank Greenberg, inexplicably let Rosen go, ending his stellar career on a low note.

Sandford (Sandy) Koufax compiled a disappointing record as a pitcher in his first six years for the Brooklyn Dodgers. But the lefthander hit his stride in the 1960s, compiling no-hit games in 1962, 1963 and 1964 and a perfect game in 1965, striking out no less than 27 players.

Like Greenberg, he wouldn't play on Yom Kippur, which coincided with the first game of the World Series in 1965, when Koufax was scheduled to pitch.

Jews and Baseball also highlights the careers of Ron Blomberg, the game's first designated hitter; Ken Holtzman, who won more games than any other Jewish pitcher (175); Shawn Green, who was probably the best Jewish player of the 1990s, and Kevin Youkilis, who is touted as the finest Jewish player in the game today.

The film also mentions off-field figures such as Allan (Bud) Selig, baseball's first (and current) Jewish commissioner, and Marvin Miller, the lawyer and former executive director of the Major League Baseball Players Association who struck down the reserve clause and thereby raised the salaries of players across the board by a significant margin.

Israeli artists boycott Ariel cultural centre

By AMI EDEN
JTA

NEW YORK — Big-time Hollywood Jews sent a strong message last year to artists protesting Israel: don't mess with Tel Aviv.

The fight was over the decision of the 2009 Toronto International Film Festival to spotlight Tel Aviv. More than 1,000 prominent filmmakers, actors and academics – including Jane Fonda, Danny Glover, Harry Belafonte, Julie Christie and Alice Walker – signed a petition stating that by showcasing movies from Tel Aviv, the festival, "whether intentionally or not, has become complicit in the Israeli propaganda machine."

In response, the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles put together a counter statement criticizing the protest and defending the film festival's focus on Tel Aviv. The pro-Israel statement was signed by a smaller but more prominent list of celebrities, including Jerry Seinfeld, Natalie Portman, Sacha Baron Cohen, Lisa Kudrow, Jason Alexander and Lenny Kravitz.

Another brouhaha is developing, one that centres on the opening of a new cultural centre in Ariel, built with more than $10 million of public funds. More than 50 Israeli theatre professionals signed a petition in late August saying that they will not perform in the new cultural centre when it opens in November. The boycott also has attracted the support of at least 150 Israeli academics and authors.

But several major Israeli theatres are scheduled to stage productions there this year, and top Israeli government leaders have slammed the boycott.

Jewish celebrities again are jumping into the fight – but on the side of the artists – taking aim at Israeli policy.

More than 150 American television and film artists have signed a letter in support of the Israeli artists' boycott. Signatories include actor Ed Asner and Cynthia Nixon, who played Miranda on Sex and the City, as well as playwright Tony Kushner and actors Mandy Patinkin and Theodore Bikel.

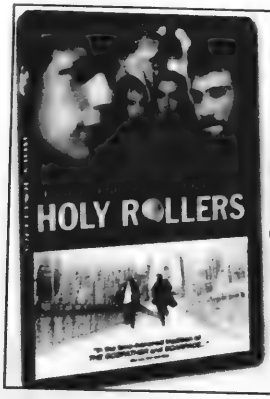
They praised the "brave decision" by Israeli theatre professionals who "have refused to allow their work to be used to normalize a cruel occupation that they know to be wrong."

To be sure, when it comes to attracting Hollywood A-listers, the recent letter does not match last year's statement in support of the Toronto film festival. But many of the big names who weighed in last year on Israel's side are absent from the debate this time.

Observers on both sides of the issue said the different reactions to the two fights do not represent a weakening of support for the Jewish state, but simply reflect the deep divide among American Jews over the issue of Israeli settlements.

Patinkin supports Israel in a variety of ways, but says the settlements "ignite the situation" between Israelis and Palestinians.

"The settlements are in direct violation of the Green Line [Israel's pre-1967 borders] and of international law," Patinkin told JTA. "It is now the artists who are standing up and saying, we refuse to play in a new theatre that you have built in an illegal settlement, and we are asking the world to pay attention. American artists who signed this two-paragraph piece are saying, we are with you."



In 1998, one million tabs of ecstasy were smuggled into the USA by a group of Hasidic Jews.

Starring Jesse Eisenberg (The Social Network, Zombieland) and Justin Bartha (The Hangover), Holy Rollers is inspired by actual events in an Orthodox Brooklyn community where a young man is forced to choose between a life of pills or piety. Dealing or davening?

Book reflects author's need to keep searching

By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

Alison Pick's suspenseful, multilayered novel, Far to Go (House of Anansi Press), tells the story of a family of secular Jews in Czechoslovakia on the brink of the Nazi invasion. Decades later, a Holocaust studies professor delivers family letters to their intended recipient, with shocking results.

CJN: Could you tell us how your grandparents' escape inspired your book?

Alison Pick: My grandfather was out of the country on business when the Nazis invaded. An ardent Czech nationalist, he never returned to his homeland. He was able to bribe for the papers to get my grandmother out: like Anneliese Bauer in Far to Go, my Granny boarded the last train leaving Prague and, like Anneliese, she was turned back at the border.

Unlike the Bauers, my grandparents eventually made it to safety. Their shared passport reveals gymnastic-like logistics – they travelled to Italy, Greece, Palestine, London and Trinidad before arriving in Canada. Once here, they embarked on a journey that I can only assume was equally harrowing: learning the fate of their relatives, afraid for their children as Jews in Canada, they decided to renounce the faith.

Alison Pick

CJN: In the Czech chapters, Marta, the family nanny, makes a perfect narrator – no one could describe the textured intimacies of daily life better – yet she also plays an important role in what happens. How did you come up with Marta?

Pick: I had to wrestle with Marta more than any other character. Anneliese is based vaguely on my father's mother, whom I knew into my adulthood, and while I found [the Bauers' son] Pepik's perspective difficult, I understood this small boy from the get-go. The challenge with Marta was to make her at once likeable and unreliable – her unreliability or naiveté creates tension. In early drafts, she came across as more sinister than I'd intended, so I focused on bringing out her humanity, her love for Pepik, and her uncertainty in the face of the tumultuous times.

CJN: Betrayal and the rediscovery of one's roots are strong themes in your book. How did writing about this period in your family history affect you?

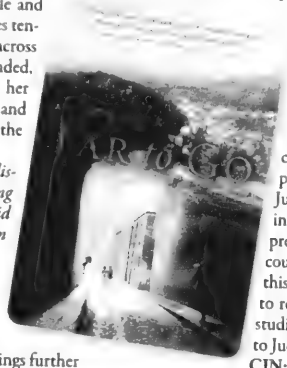
Pick: I already knew about my dad's family – they were Jewish, they'd denied their Judaism, their relatives died in the camps. The writing process allowed me to explore these things further and wrestle with the question of motivation.

As a child in the '70s in southern Ontario, I was aware of tolerance and diversity; I was unaware of the systemic discrimination that pervades western culture. The message I received was that I could and should be exactly who I was, and so should everyone around me. Thus, the discovery that my grandparents had concealed their 'true' identities not only from their community but from their own children was confusing and upsetting.

As I grew, I was better able to understand their decision in context: the anti-Semitism that pervaded Canada at that time, the fact that my grandmother's family had been entirely non-practising, and most significantly, the terror they must have felt about what happened in Europe. The writing process deepened my understanding and my compassion for their decision [to deny Judaism].



Conversely, through the character of Pavel, I could explore another option: that one's Judaism could be strengthened in adversity, could be newly appreciated, better lived. It was encouraging to me to fully inhabit this potentiality as I took the steps to reclaim what had been lost and studied for official conversion back to Judaism.

CJN: What interested you in following Pepik aboard a Kindertransport organized by English stockbroker Nicholas Winton?

Pick: That was purely a literary decision, a way for the reader to see what happened to Pepik's family in the wake of his departure – how things turned out in the end. So much of writing a novel is pacing. I wanted to resolve all the threads at a speed that was satisfying for the reader.

I considered continuing further into the first months of the war and, concurrently, with Pepik at his adoptive home in Scotland, but the book seemed to want to wind up sooner. For me, writing involves listening closely to the material and following where it leads. Sounds hokey maybe, but when I trust my instinct over my intellect, nine times out of 10, the book is stronger for it.

CJN: "I had never in my life felt so close to someone and at the same time so far away," Prof. Lisa thinks as the book's mysteries unfold. Is that a fair description of your own journey of discovery?

Pick: Yes, now that you mention it, that about sums it up! As does her statement about longing to keep searching for new information and insight, even though everyone involved is dead and gone.

In my case, my father is left, but both my grandparents, and of course their parents, aren't around anymore for me to ask what happened and why, and how they felt about it. Happily, though, the process of writing the book did make me feel like I was spending time with them somehow. I felt closer to my grandfather in particular.

Despite family lore that Judaism wasn't important to them, my research revealed a more complex story. I learned that my great-grandmother, who also escaped to Canada, fasted secretly on Yom Kippur every year of her life. And my grandfather once said, in response to his cousin converting to Christianity [hoping it would help her escape], that he wouldn't convert if he were the last Jew on earth.

I have now converted to Judaism, as has my husband, and we are raising our baby daughter in the faith. So I wish my grandfather was still around to share this with. I think he would have been proud.

CUPW wrong on Israel

By FRED TOULCH
Special to The CJN

About two years ago, a CUPW (Canadian Union of Postal Workers) rep came into my postal station in Downsview. She was wearing a T-shirt that, in essence, said Israel's treatment of Palestinians is the same as apartheid in South Africa.

I immediately went to the office of the superintendent. I asked that this person be removed from our station and not be allowed back. The superintendent complied with my request.

I then went to the office of CUPW's Toronto local. I soon learned that the anti-Israel pro-Palestinian stand is that of CUPW.

Since then, I have been a regular attendee at CUPW monthly meetings to try and get this policy reversed or dropped. I have asserted that this is a racist policy and in violation of the CUPW charter. In fact, every CUPW meeting begins with the reading of a policy condemning racism.

I have pushed for a vote of the attendees at the meetings to see how many agreed with the "union's position." The chair would not allow a vote. This is because policies passed at the national convention cannot be challenged at the local level.

Overwhelming majority of Jews do not support union's positions

I have written and phoned past CUPW president Deborah Burke and current president Denis Lemelin. Neither would return my calls nor answer my letters.

In mid-September, CUPW held three meetings in Toronto. The union executive deemed the meeting on Sunday, Sept. 12, to be vitally important. We were there to elect regional delegates. I was on the ballot and do not know yet if I was successful.

The Saturday meetings were not promoted. They were called to give postal workers an opportunity to hear, read and vote on the union demands for the upcoming contract.

I attended the Saturday afternoon meeting. I would estimate that the auditorium where it was held could seat 400 to 500 people. There were fewer than 50 people in attendance.

I sat in the front row. I was amazed to see Lemelin among the three people on the podium.

When Lemelin began his remarks, he promised to gladly answer questions from the audience when he finished.

Lemelin went over some of the union's 90 demands, spending most of his time on those issues raised by the Toronto local. Throughout his remarks, he kept returning to his main theme – unity. It was essential that all brothers and sisters of the union be united and that each person in attendance urge our colleagues to be fully committed to all the demands.

When he finally finished speaking, I was the second person at the microphone. I began by stating that the demands were well thought out, but that there was virtually no one there to appreciate them. I then asked Lemelin how he could speak so eloquently on unity but then go back to Quebec and advocate racist, anti-Israel/anti-Semitic policies – specifically boycott, divestment and sanctions. Did he think any Jewish union brothers and sisters could support that platform? Why was he pushing policies that the general membership does not endorse?

Lemelin replied: "Brother, I will be happy to answer all your questions after the vote."

A few minutes later, he went on at length to answer my questions – supposedly. He skirted the main issues with double-speak. I was only able to respond when he finished, and I could not remember all of the inaccuracies and half-truths in his arguments.

He made the following points: 178 groups supported CUPW anti-Israel position; many Jews agree with the policy; the United Nations sides against Israel , and CUPW's policy has remained consistent for many years.

I answered him as follows: there are about one billion Muslims in the world. Many do not like Israel. To find 178 anti-Israel groups among this lot is like finding 178 grains of sand in a desert.

Jews are not a monolithic group, but certainly the overwhelming majority do not support the CUPW position.

With respect to CUPW's past anti-Israel position, I said that something that was once endorsed in no way legitimizes it.

I asked him why he didn't answer my e-mail nor return my phone call.

I concluded by saying that Jews are indigenous to the Middle East and that Jews have a far greater right to Israel than French-Canadians have to Quebec.

Lemelin responded by saying he is not anti-Semitic and believes Israel has a right to exist. He claimed never to have seen my e-mail nor received my phone message.

My letter, co-written with retired teacher Max Beer of Montreal, refers to an article by Lemelin in which he quotes "human rights experts and analysts" who assert Israel is guilty of a "slow genocide." An Internet search revealed that the term was used by Omar Barghouti, a founding member of the BDS movement, who, despite calling for a boycott of Israel, is currently engaged in postgraduate studies in philosophy at Tel Aviv University.

It would seem that CUPW uses the same kind of rationale as Barghouti. Would it not be more useful to boycott governments, such as Sudan, that are supporting events that come closer to human rights violations and mass murder than anything Israel has done which has inflicted hundreds of thousands of deaths in its Darfur region since 2003, far more than then entire death toll in the Palestinian/Israeli conflict since 1947?

And who is supporting the Sudanese government? One of its most ardent backers is China, which purchases oil from the East African nation, supplies it with weapons and provides it with diplomatic cover. China also continues to suppress the aspirations of the Tibetan people, and it leads the world in executions.

I suggested that if CUPW were really interested in human rights, it would lead a boycott against products from China.

I guess principles only matter when they don't really affect you.

Fred Toulch is a letter carrier in Toronto.

Habs' roster now has two Jewish players

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

As one wag recently put it in a recent Montreal Gazette letter to the editor: "Go Heebs go!"

Jeff Halpern

That was his reaction after news came out Sept. 7 that the Montreal Canadiens had signed forward Jeff Halpern to a one-year, $600,000 contract.

That made Maryland native Halpern, 34, and 28-year-old star forward Mike Cammalleri, who signed with the Habs a year ago, two Jewish players on one National Hockey League team – arguably for the first time in the league's history.

Halpern's start in the NHL was in 1999, playing five seasons for the Washington Capitals. He then played for the Dallas Stars, Tampa Bay Lightning and spent the 2009-10 season split between the Lightning and Los Angeles Kings. Halpern's best season was with the Capitals in 2003-04, with 19 goals and 27 assists. His career stats are 131 goals and 316 points over 720 regular season games.

He also captained the U.S. national team for the 2008 World Championships held in Canada and is considered a versatile player, reported to be most comfortable at centre although he played right wing last season.

Halpern also sat out one game with the Capitals in 2006 to observe Yom Kippur and is a member of the Greater Washington Jewish Sports Hall of Fame.

Cammalleri, who has a Jewish mother (the daughter of Holocaust survivors) and an Italian father, last year signed with the Habs for a record $30 million over five years – that's 10 times Halpern's salary averaged out over one year.

Cammalleri was leading the Habs in scoring last season with 26 goals when he was sidelined with a knee injury in January. The

Mike Cammalleri

Richmond Hill native showed his true stuff, though, during the playoffs, when he led the league in scoring with 13 goals, including seven goals in as many games against the Pittsburgh Penguins. Those numbers tied a team record held by Habs legends such as Jean Beliveau, Bernie (Boom-Boom) Geoffrion, Maurice Richard and Frank Mahovlich.

Cammalleri's lifetime stats are 158 goals and 337 points over 429 regular season games.

There are other Jewish players competing in the NHL: Toronto Maple Leafs forward Mike Brown; Minnesota Wilds left-winger Eric Nystrom; and former Hab and current Phoenix Coyote defenceman Mathieu Schneider.

Rafic cruises to Youth Olympics gold

By RAMI HIPSH
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

SINGAPORE — Israel's Maayan Rafic, who led the boys Techno 293 windsurf race competition wire to wire, placed high enough in the final race to win the gold medal at the Youth Olympics in Singapore.

He finished nine points ahead of Hong Kong's Michael Chun Leung Cheng, who took the silver. Britain's Kieran Martin won the medal race on the final day to pick up the bronze.

The popular Israeli made many friends during the Youth Olympics and was barely able to contain his joy after reaching the shore.

"It's unbelievable. I don't have any words to describe it, it's great, great, great," Rafic said after the final. "When I went over the finish line, everyone was clapping. It was an amazing feeling."

Rafic's gold was the fourth for Israel at the Youth Olympics.

Naomi Cohen missed her chance to win a medal when she finished eighth in the final sailing race of the girls Techno 293 event. She was edged out by Singapore's Audrey Pei Lin Yong, who came in third in the final race to secure the bronze medal.

Israel won a bronze, however, thanks to Rotem Shor, part of the European team in judo. Israel placed 16th among all countries in the medal rankings.

Israel loses to Austria in Davis Cup tennis tournament

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's Davis Cup team lost to Austria in the World Group playoffs on the third and final day of the tennis tournament, played at Nokia Stadium in Tel Aviv.

Despite many Israel fans' hopes and expectations following the 2-1 advantage Israel had gained in the matches of the previous two days, Dudi Sela and Harel Levy lost to Austrians Jurgen Melzer and Martin Fischer, respectively, in separate matches.

Levy entered the second match knowing that the fate of his team rested on his shoulders, following Sela's defeat by Melzer, who is ranked 13th in the world.

Levy opened the match strongly against the inexperienced Fischer, but he slowly surrendered to Fischer's talents in four sets and ultimately lost Israel's chances to advance further in the Davis Cup, losing 3-2 to the Austrians in the entire competition.

'Don't be yourself!'

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

"Go mingle!" Meir sets me free. "But remember, don't be yourself. Instead, be nice, smiley, charming, and talk about your career."

I ignore the affront and head to the posh party.

Important-looking people from the industry gather in small groups. Tonight, I'm a serious woman who wants to promote herself and network. I approach a solemn-looking group.

"So!" I shout, "what are we talking about, huh? Huh?"

People look at me puzzled.

Man: We were just talking about Suzy.

Me: Dear old Suzy! I just had lunch with her yesterday, such a doll!

Woman: You met Suzy yesterday? Suzy passed away last month.

Me: Oh, that Suzy. Bless her soul. But let's stick with the living. I am an actress and a writer!

The group ignores me, so I head to another group. These people are laughing.

Me: That was so funny! I swear!

Man (still smiling): What exactly did you like about it?

Me (I grab a wineglass from the walking waiter.): Pardon?

Man: In my movie, what amused you the most?

Me: Well, I can honestly say that I had a long chat with your leading lady, and she resembles her character exactly!

Woman (examines me): My character is a cold-blooded serial killer. Where exactly did you find the resemblance?

Me (I sip wine quickly): All I have to say is: Thank goodness for alcohol! (Wink at the man).

Woman: What's wrong with you? Tom's doing very well in AA!

I stroll away in a very good mood, meeting people, mingling. Then a dignified woman approaches me.

Woman: Tell me, dear, who told you to come here?

Me (sigh): God… (it's too complicated to explain).

Woman (gently): Did God tell you to come here, darling?

I run away from the nut lady and stand eating a big piece of pastry, next to a man who looks familiar.

Me: You look famous. Aren't you that great producer, Mike something?

Mike something smiles humbly.

Me: Last I've heard, you refused to purchase the rights for that awful movie about sea urchins. What a poor mistake that would have been, eh?

Mike something: I've just bought the rights.

Me: Yay! Congratulations! Bye!

Mike something: Hold on, just wanted to warn you. Rumour is that some lunatic woman snuck into our private party. Apparently, God told her to come. Plus, she has lunches with dead people. Beware!

Me: I will. By the way, I'm an actress and a writer. I hope you didn't cast Miranda something in your new movie, This Hairy Billy Goat.

Mike something: I did. She's my daughter-in-law.

Well, I should have figured it out – same last name.

I decide to take off, and I turn to the door, when a tall man stops me.

Man: Are you that madcap actress/writer they're all talking about?

Me: Who me? God forbid, I'm no actress, nor a writer.

Man (laughs): Too bad. I'm looking for her. I really need a free-spirit meshuge actress for my next project. Well, so long.

I leave the party and wait for my cab.

All in all, I think it went well, don't you?

Pilates strengthens core muscles

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

Pilates is a great way for almost anyone to get lean, strong and more flexible, whether she or he is an athlete or a couch potato.

Pilates is a series of low-impact exercises that can be modified to suit different fitness levels, making it safe for almost everyone.

Pilates is a form of exercise developed by a man named Joseph Pilates in the 1920s. He developed this exercise method to be used in rehabilitation, and it has been growing in popularity since the 1990s.

Pilates is considered therapeutic exercise because it releases contracted muscles, tendons and fascia. It mobilizes joints, increasing flexibility while improving coordination and balance and building muscle strength. It can improve circulation and promote relaxation at the same time.

Pilates is full-body exercise that starts in the core.The core muscles are those deep muscles in your stomach and back, close to your spine. Strong core muscles mean less back pain and better posture.

Pilates exercises are controlled movements done on a mat, floor, or a machine called the Reformer. The Reformer helps connect your mind and body by teaching you how to find and use the right muscles for safe and injury-free movement.

There are many different kinds of Pilates today, including Pilates on the ball, yoga Pilates, Pilates with bands and, of course, contemporary Pilates, which is widely used by physiotherapists to help their clients strengthen muscle groups during rehabilitation after injury or surgery.

There are many places you can find Pilates today besides the physiotherapy office, including community centres or gyms that offer group classes and specialized studios that offer individual sessions as well as small group classes.

If you prefer to exercise at home, you can hire a certified Pilates instructor to come to your residence or you can pick up some great Pilates DVDs at your local large department store and other retailers.

Check with your doctor before you start any new exercise program.

Pakistan: beyond Jewish humanitarianism?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The world was once again witness to a devastating natural disaster of epic proportions, this time in Pakistan. Millions of men, women and children are homeless. There are the dead and injured. The earth's waters are stirring and angry.

"Pakistan," however, created a challenge for the Jewish world. Knowing Pakistan is home to many Muslim fundamentalists intent upon the destruction of the State of Israel, should we show compassion to our "enemies"?

The immediate response is: men, women and children are in distress and it is our responsibility as Jews, involved in tikkun olam, to assist where we can. Obviously, the vast majority of the water-soaked Pakistanis couldn't care less about Israel. Should we take a poll before we assist to determine the victim's political ideologies?

The question still remains, however. The Jewish world has a limited amount of resources, so why not distribute them to a nation not antagonistic toward Israel and the Jewish people?

Here is one answer. Diaspora Jewry has an unbreakable partnership with the State of Israel. We work together in "fields of crisis" when possible and separately when required. So when Israel stayed out of Pakistan, in essence below the radar, it was time for us to go above it. Those Jewish humanitarian organizations and community members who responded to Pakistan knew it was our time to help the suffering and similarly show the goodness of the Jewish people.

This approach is very much in sync with former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir's creation of Mashav, an arm of the Israel Foreign Ministry that offers humanitarian assistance around the world. One of her prime motivations was to make friends "on the ground" through the sharing of Israeli expertise.

Meir understood that while political allies would be hard to come by in places such as Pakistan, a mother whose child was helped by a Jew would always remember. Decades later, with Israeli-trained eye clinicians in Ethiopia, her dream is a reality.

While we must not misplace our compassion, and allow for the growth of our enemies, in the case of Pakistan that is not the case. Pakistan is a country threatened by the Taliban and Al Qaeda, and works with other nations to weed out terrorism.

Israel has held high-level talks with Pakistan to establish official relations. Israel has offered, and Pakistan has accepted (albeit through a third party) humanitarian aid in the past, specifically during the 2005 Kashmir earthquake. There is reason to believe Israel and Pakistan could create stronger alliances, and perhaps a Jewish humanitarian response might help push that along.

I believe the Jewish people are a team. A segment of that team should express their frustration at the proliferation of terrorists in Pakistan and donate their money elsewhere. The team, however, must include members – such as the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee – who have worked in the field and are well positioned to establish "friendships" in a non-political way.

The flooding in Pakistan has created enormous suffering. While it would be incongruous to launch a crisis response for the Taliban, card-carrying enemies of Israel, I do feel it's important to do something in Pakistan.

Of course, I am angry when Israeli aid workers are denied visas to assist those in need, but I say, regardless, forge ahead. I pray I am right and that our assistance helps alleviate some of the stress of the Pakistani people and, secondly, creates a more positive atmosphere for Jews, the State of Israel and all humankind.

God bless the Jews and Israel. God bless the Pakistani people. Let us pray for peace in 5771.

Israel extends construction freeze

By BARAK RAVID
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has agreed to extend Israel's freeze on settlement construction for 60 days, the London-based newspaper Asharq al-Awsat quoted Israeli officials as saying on Monday.

The Asharq al-Awsat article came amid recent reports that U.S. President Barack Obama had offered Netanyahu an incentive package in exchange for keeping settlement construction at bay, a move that could ease Palestinians' concerns over settlement building and bring them back to the negotiating table.

According to Israeli sources quoted in the report, Netanyahu expressed his preliminary approval for an extension of Israel's moratorium on settlement building, which ended last week, on the condition that such a move would be accompanied by a list of U.S. assurances, including a continued Israel Defence Forces presence in the Jordan Valley and continued U.S. political and military support.

Sources quoted in Asharq al-Awsat also said Netanyahu claimed that the assurances listed would aid him in the face of the widespread internal opposition expected to follow such a move.

Speaking at a meeting of Likud ministers shortly before the weekly cabinet meeting in Jerusalem on Monday, Netanyahu made a possible reference to the Asharq al-Awsat report, saying that there were "a lot of reports on the subject, most of which are wrong, and we can't deny or correct everything.

"There's no need to start a debate on the subject," he said, adding, however that Israel is in the "midst of sensitive talks with the U.S. administration to find a solution that would allow talks to continue.

"There's no need to cause a stir, but there is a need to conduct ourselves in a wise and responsible manner in order to advance the diplomatic process," Netanyahu said, adding that he believed he had to "weigh the situation quietly and far from the spotlight, and act quietly.

"Efforts, mainly discreet ones, are made, and we are expected to conduct ourselves in a restrained, discreet manner," he said. "If a decision will be made, it would be brought before appropriate governmental bodies."

Israel is "interested in achieving peace," he said, adding that this is a "vital interest of the State of Israel."

Last week, the White House denied that Obama sent Netanyahu a letter proposing a set of U.S. guarantees in exchange for Israel's extending a freeze on settlement construction in the West Bank for another two months.

The News in Brief

Canada

Sentence Condemned

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress condemned last week's sentencing by Iran of blogger Hossein Derakshan to 19 years in prison for "insulting Islamic thought." Congress CEO Bernie Farber called the jailing of Derakshan, a 35-year-old Iranian-Canadian dual citizen, "an utter outrage." Farber commended Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon "for his strong denunciation of this barbarous punishment" and urged "continued pressure on the Iranian regime" to secure his release. Derakshan made a high-profile visit to Israel in 2006 using his Canadian passport, with the aim of humanizing Israelis for Iranians.

CUPW Blasted

TORONTO — Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) last week condemned Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW) president Denis Lemelin for agreeing to speak at an anti-Israel boycott, sanctions and divestment conference to be held Oct. 22 to 24 in Montreal. CUPW is one of the organizers, along with groups such as Independent Jewish Voices, and Palestinian and Jewish Unity. FSWC said the meeting disproportionately demonizes Israel and questions its right to exist by calling it an apartheid state. "It is shameful for a president of a major Canadian union to participate in a conference with strident anti-Semitic overtones, especially while the peace process is actively being pursued by both sides," president and CEO Avi Benlolo said.

Fire Fund Established

TORONTO — UJA Federation of Greater Toronto launched a fund last week to aid the 1,200 people forced from their highrise apartment building at 200 Wellesley St E. by a Sept. 24 fire. Many needed supplies such as underwear, shoes, socks, underwear and blankets. Donations can be made at ujadonations.com or at 416-631-5705.

World

Art Returned

JERUSALEM — The Israel Museum has restituted a Paul Klee drawing to the estate of the Jewish art collector who owned the work before it was looted by the Nazis. Klee's 1920 drawing was owned by Harry Fuld Jr. from 1932 to 1941. Fuld left Veil Dance and several other works with a transport firm when he fled to England in 1937. In 1941, after a new law by which Jews who left Germany lost their German nationality and property, his citizenship and assets were revoked, and his art was confiscated by the Third Reich. The drawing was received in 1950 by the Israel Museum's precursor, the Bezalel National Museum, through the Jewish Restitution Successor Organization, set up after World War II to distribute looted works of art whose owners or heirs were unknown. Fuld died in 1963, and left his estate to his housekeeper. At her death in 1992, she left her estate to the United Kingdom's branch of Magen David Adom (MDA). After new research brought the drawing's provenance to light, the museum transferred the drawing to MDA.

Malware Arrests

TEHRAN — Iran announced the arrests of suspected hackers linked to the Stuxnet malware, which has affected its nuclear facilities. Heydar Moslehi, the Iranian intelligence minister, didn't say how many people had been arrested. Iranian media quoted Moslehi as saying Oct. 2 the attack was under control. The program, which can seize control of industrial plants, has infected at least 30,000 computers in Iran, including some affecting the country's Bushehr nuclear plant, according to Iranian reports. Officials have said the attack is the work of Israel and other western powers. Some reports have said the worm affected Natanz, a nuclear plant that unlike Bushehr is believed to be part of Iran's suspected nuclear weapons program. Analysts also uncovered hints within the worm of associations with Esther, the Jewish queen of Persia who helped prevent a Jewish genocide in the Book of Esther, and with Iranian Jews persecuted by the current regime.

Israeli Chassid Killed

KIEV — Two attackers are being held in the stabbing death in Ukraine of an Israeli Chassid. Shmuel Tobol, 19, a Breslover, was stabbed Sept. 26 in Uman while visiting the grave of Rabbi Nachman of Breslov on the 200th anniversary of his death. Tobol's brother was also injured in the attack. The brothers were chasing local residents who had damaged their car with rocks when a brawl ensued.

ADL Criticizes Rock Show's Imagery

Roger Waters

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League has lashed out at rock star Roger Waters, claiming imagery used in his latest tour is anti-Semitic.

Waters, formerly of Pink Floyd, is a vocal critic of Israel's policies, and his 2010-11 "The Wall Live" Tour that takes aim at Israel's West Bank security fence.

During his performances of Goodbye Blue Sky, an animated scene projects images of planes dropping bombs in the shape of Jewish Stars of David followed by dollar signs, the ADL said.

At the tour's kickoff last month in Toronto, other images dropping from the planes included crosses, crescents and the logos of firms such as Shell and Mercedes-Benz.

The images crossed a line into anti-Semitism, and "[play] into and [recall] the worst age-old anti-Semitic stereotype about Jews and their supposed obsession with making money," ADL director Abraham Foxman said.

Waters denied the show is anti-Semitic, adding that "there are no hidden meanings in the order or juxtaposition of these symbols. The point I am trying to make… is that the bombardment we are all subject to by conflicting religious, political and economic ideologies only encourages us to turn against one another, and I mourn the concomitant loss of life."

Waters, 67, used a 2009 tour of Israel to highlight his criticism of Israel's barrier surrounding the West Bank, calling it an "awful thing" amounting to a land grab.

Inert land mines set off scare at Pearson

El Al security personnel flag container at airport

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Police are investigating an incident at Toronto's Pearson International Airport in which El Al security personnel flagged a container of inert land mines that was to be shipped to UN forces in the Sinai Peninsula.

Peel Regional Police were called to the airport Sept. 26 after El Al agents detected trace amounts of explosives in the shipment.

Peel Police evacuated a cargo building where the cargo skid was located and called in the Canadian Forces for assistance before it was determined the materials posed no danger, said Const. Wayne Patterson.

"We seized it and turned it over to the military, because it was inert military training device," he said.

"It's now an RCMP investigation."

Dina Kutner, El Al's Canadian general manager, declined to comment on the incident, saying only, "Our security department does what it has to do and it's very effective."

News reports from Israel suggest the cargo was destined for the Multinational Force and Observers in the Sinai Peninsula, but UN officials failed to inform El Al about the shipment.

John Thompson, executive director of the Mackenzie Institute, a Toronto think-tank, said "you'd be surprised what's being shipped" on commercial flights.

"When police departments order new pistols, they are shipped by courier," he said, though live ammunition is treated differently.

Monitoring devices are so sensitive they can detect even minute particles of an explosive in inert mines. "If I travel to Israel and packed dirty clothes from the gun range, it would probably trip the alarm," he said.

"Inert land mines are common training devices, especially in the Sinai. No one has managed to clear all mines."

Land mines for training could have been scrubbed clean and rendered inert but residual explosives will still set off detection devices, he added.

Iran's conspiratorial delusions

Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's address to the UN General Assembly on Sept. 23, in which he alleged that the United States was behind the 9/11 attacks in order to reverse its faltering economy and to save the "Zionist regime," received a lot of media attention

"The majority of the American people as well as other nations and politicians agree with this view," he said. In another part of his speech, Ahmadinejad claimed that the "horrible crimes" of Israel (only referred to as the "Zionist regime") are largely responsible for the world's problems

Mark Kornblau, a U.S. State Department spokesperson, replied bluntly: "Rather than representing the aspirations and goodwill of the Iranian people, Mr. Ahmadinejad has yet again chosen to spout vile conspiracy theories and anti-Semitic slurs that are as abhorrent and delusional as they are predictable."

The State Department's use of the word "delusional" is significant, because the official U.S. position remains one of being open to dialogue with Iran. On Sept. 23, the BBC's Jonathan Marcus reported that according to a very senior White House official, "over the past year a number of senior Iranian figures have made approaches to the U.S. administration eager to establish some kind of back-channel diplomacy. However, the U.S. view is that while it wants dialogue, it does not want to become entangled in factional battles in Tehran, preferring to wait until somebody with the approval of Iran's Supreme Leader takes the first step."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

For his part, U.S. President Barack Obama, while calling Ahmadinejad's comments at the UN "hateful," told the BBC's Persian service interviewer that a diplomatic solution remained possible on the nuclear issue. "But it is going to require a change in mindset inside the... Iranian government," Obama added.

Although it has yet to be properly addressed by the U.S. administration, the problem is that there appears to be no way to reconcile these apparently irreconcilable positions. Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, has indeed given his approval to Ahmadinejad, whose "delusional" views arguably express Khamenei's and those of the ruling mullah class. In other words, Ahmadinejad's rabid conspiratorial mindset, far from being an individual quirk, is broadly representative of the Iranian government as a whole.

If the mindset of its government would first have to change as a precondition for rationally engaging Iran, that would mean Tehran giving up its pervasive conspiracy theories, foremost those concerning "Zionists," i.e. Jews. Since the chance of this happening is virtually nil, Iran will remain in the grips of its dangerous delusion. And the West must plan accordingly.

The National Post's Sept. 25 editorial reflected precisely this point when it said: "The danger with Ahmadinejad lies in the ease with which the man can be written off as a buffoon. His regular clown act makes it seem as if we could dismiss the very real threat his country represents, and thus reduces pressure to take decisive action against it."

In a column on the same day devoted to examining the conspiratorial mindset – something that many highly educated people in the West are not immune to – Jonathan Kay emphasized that "conspiracy theories are especially prominent in Islamic societies such as Iran."

Ahmadinejad's latest outrageous expression of these theories is, as Rex Murphy put it, "bile at its most rancid," but it must be taken as a serious interpretation of the world. And no matter how perverse, it's one that Iran could well act upon, if the country is allowed to become armed with nuclear weapons.

Speaking of which, on TVO's Sept. 27 The Agenda, which was devoted to the question of Iran, Rashad Khalidi, who holds Edward Said's old chair of Arab Studies at Columbia University, insisted with complete certainty that Iran would never launch nuclear weapons on Israel.

Does Iran pose an existential threat to Israel? "Absolutely not," said Khalidi, arguing that the Iranian leadership is rational, and as such would be deterred by the prospect of Israel's massive second-strike capacity. Furthermore, Khalidi charged, Israel's political leadership well understands this and is just "cynically manipulating" public fears over Iran's bluster to its own advantage.

To say the least, Khalidi's dead certainty about Iran's intentions is, in its own way, as shocking as Ahmadinejad's delusional interpretation about the U.S., Israel, and 9/11.

'Lost tribe of Israel' found in southern India

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As tribes go, the Bene Ephraim are hardly noticeable in the vastness of India – perhaps 150 souls if everyone from nearby villages was counted together. But, if their traditions are accurate, they lay claim to an ancient lineage as one of the legendary 10 lost tribes of Israel.

A dirt-poor collection of mostly farm labourers who reside in the southeastern Indian village of Kotha Reddy Palem in the province of Andhra Pradesh, the Bene Ephraim believe they were exiled by the Assyrian Empire after the destruction of the Kingdom of Israel in 722 BCE.

They have been so obscure that the established Jewish community in Mumbai only learned of them in recent years, when Indian security forces uncovered an plot by Lashkar-e-Taiba Islamic terrorists to murder them as part of a wider attack that included an assault on a Hindu temple and the bombing of an airport.

The Bene Ephraim's remarkable story will be told on Oct. 24 at Congregation Darchei Noam by Rabbi Gerald Sussman, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El in Staten Island, N.Y., and his wife, Rabbi Bonita Sussman. The two spent three weeks with the Bene Ephraim in the summer of 2007, instructing them on Jewish practices. Their visit was co-ordinated by Kulanu, an organization that helps "emerging or returning Jewish populations," Rabbi Bonita said.

The Bene Ephraim circumcise their children; celebrate all Jewish holidays, including Purim and Chanukah, which postdate their exile from Israel; keep mezuzot in their homes; teach their children Hebrew and give them Hebrew names, she said.

They're landless farmers who work for others but who keep Shabbat as a day of rest. "That cuts into their incomes," which average only $1.40 per day, she said. They live in clay-walled houses with thatched roofs and no running water, though there is intermittent electrical service.

Despite their adherence to Jewish lifecycle events, they are willing to undergo conversion to assure their link to the wider Jewish world, although that is problematic in India, which has laws against missionaries, she said.

Rabbi Gerald acknowledges reconstructing the Bene Ephraim's history is fraught with uncertainty, but according to their traditions, they were exiled from ancient Israel and made their way to India through Assyria, Persia and the area that is now Afghanistan. Skeptics point out that as recently as the 19th century, they were practising Christians.

Return CUPW's message to sender

Attempts at demonization and delegitimization of Israel on the world stage are, sadly, nothing new as far as the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) movement goes. But reports that Denis Lemelin, president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW), has decided not only to attend but to speak at a major three-day anti-Israel conference in Montreal later this month is a disturbing revelation.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies brought the information to light late last week, with Avi Benlolo, the centre's president and CEO, decrying Lemelin's participation as "shameful... especially while the peace process is actively being pursued by both sides on the ground."

From Oct. 22 to 24, the Global BDS Movement, the key organizer of the event, will present speakers and "experts" on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the majority of whom will likely spew their usual vitriol and condemnations against all forms of perceived Israeli atrocities committed in the name of the "occupation." False linkages to the South African system of apartheid will no doubt be spoken about as well.

Why the head of one of Canada's most essential, hard-working, multicultural workforces feels that this is the time to openly push an anti-Israel agenda on behalf of his membership is anyone's guess. It should be noted, however, that CUPW began supporting the BDS campaign when it passed a resolution on the matter in 2008, and Lemelin has since stated that his union – which represents more than 54,000 postal workers – views all Gazans as "prisoners."

A recent Canada Post decision to temporarily suspend delivery of Canadian outbound mail to Gaza, due to the arrest of the head of the Palestinian Postal Authority over Israeli security concerns, may have served to further raise the ire of Lemelin and his colleagues. In a Sept. 2 interview with The CJN, Lemelin showed a disquieting amount of ignorance, willful or not, about the nuances of the conflict, and he made it clear which side he has chosen to support.

When asked whether he believed Israel had legitimate security concerns based on the wording of Hamas' charter, a document that calls for the destruction of Israel and the murder of Jews, Lemelin uttered a succinct reply: "That's what you say." He then went on to defend Hamas, a recognized terrorist entity by most western governments, as a democratically elected body.

What he seemingly did not take into account or acknowledge are the reasons why Israel has implemented stringent security measures with respect to Gaza in the first place – namely, to protect Israeli citizens from coming under continual attack from an organization that refuses to recognize Israel's right to exist and actively seeks its elimination.

Perhaps it's time for the Jewish community to undertake more dialogue with CUPW and its leaders in order to clarify Israel's position for our valued mail carriers.

For now, it appears that neither rain, nor snow, nor sleet, nor hail shall keep the head of Canada's postal union from espousing his particular views on Israel.

It's a message that should be returned to sender. –A.L-A.

Israel launched a lightning-strike air raid on PLO headquarters in Tunisia. The attack near Tunis, 1,500 miles away, reportedly killed 67 people and wounded 100, and left PLO leader Yasser Arafat shaken. The United Nations Security Council voted 14-0 to condemn the raid, with the United States abstaining.

Sukkot art exhibit in T.O. next year?

One of the most exciting and creative celebrations of Sukkot took place recently in Union Square in New York City. For a short period of time, the low-tech sukkah became high design. Sukkah City was an exhibit of 12 architecturally avant-garde sukkot, selected in a juried competition from more than 600 entries, one of which – a "taxi cab" sukkah – was submitted by a Torontonian, Nicolas Koff. Sukkah City represents a new way to conceptualize an ancient tradition. The winning design was selected by readers of New York magazine.

The Sukkah City website explains that "the sukkah's religious function is to commemorate the temporary structures that the Israelites dwelled in during their Exodus from Egypt, but it is also about universal ideas of transience and permanence as expressed in architecture. The sukkah is a means of ceremonially practising homelessness, while at the same time remaining deeply rooted."

Next year, Sukkah City will expand to locations all around the world. I propose that the Koffler Centre, the Ontario College of Art and Design, the faculty of architecture, landscape and design at the University of Toronto, the Toronto Board of Rabbis and our many creative Canadian architects establish a partnership, so that we will become part of Sukkah City 2011. We could erect the sukkot in Nathan Phillips Square, named for the first Jewish mayor of Toronto.

Jewish Canadian airmen buried in Britain

I am a member of the Association of Jewish Ex-service Men and Women (AJEX) in England. On Sept. 19, on the 70th anniversary of the Battle of Britain, there was a large parade at a Royal Air Force cemetery in a town called Harrogate. This was to honour the airmen lost during the last war.

At this cemetery lie the graves of seven Jewish Canadian airmen. After the main parade, AJEX members visited – as they do every year – each of these graves, as these soldiers have no known relatives who can visit them to say Kaddish. We remember them because they gave their lives for us.

They are: (1) Jack Tass of Prince Albert, Sask., air gunner, Royal Canadian Air Force, died May 15, 1944, aged 29; (2) Harry Ratner of Winnipeg, air bomber, RCAF, died May 25, 1944, aged 26; (3) Ernest Israel Glass, pilot, RCAF, died Jan. 2 1944, aged 27; (4) Robert Sirluck of Winnipeg, air bomber, RCAF, died March 1, 1944, aged 22; (5) Morley Bernard Stock of Regina, flying officer, RCAF, died Feb. 18, 1944, aged 21; (6) R.P. Marks, flight engineer, died Dec. 16, 1943, aged 22; (7) Joseph Zareikin, air gunner, RCAF, died Oct. 5, 1944, aged 36. Please contact me if you are a relative of any of these men.

Dora Wasserman spread the Jewish word

The common theme in the stories in your Rosh Hashanah supplement is perseverance and self-sacrifice ("Women you should know," Sept. 8). The late Dora Wasserman embodies such attributes. She came to Canada in 1950 with two passions: her love for the theatre and the Yiddish language. She taught theatre and Yiddish at the Montreal Jewish Public Library and the Jewish Peoples and Peretz School. This laid the groundwork for the Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre. The theatre became internationally acclaimed, as her determination to spread the Jewish word knew no bounds.

Wasserman was sensitive to the role that theatre could play in bridging cultural divides. The French-Canadian playwright Gratien Gélinas gave her guidance and encouragement, and she collaborated with Quebec playwright Michel Tremblay.

In 1992, Wasserman was named to the Order of Canada and the Order of Quebec. The ceremony in Quebec was attended by Cardinal Marc Ouellet and Quebec Premier Jean Charest, who was then an MP. How poignant it was to see them sitting at the side of this daughter of an impoverished tailor of the shtetl, paying their respects to her. The Dora Wasserman Yiddish Theatre continues her work at Montreal's Segal Centre for Performing Arts.

Survivors of Wolta Gabersdorf

I am searching for survivors or relatives of women who were prisoners in Wolta Gabersdorf, a labour camp that was in the Czech Sudetanland. The work camp, a textile factory, later became part of Gross Rosen, a German concentration camp. I'm a second-generation survivor of Gabersdorf who is writing a book about my mother, Hela Hocherman, and I'm also working on a documentary film on the courageous girls of Gabersdorf. If you have any information, please contact me at marisafox@me.com or 917-626-5669, or in Canada, contact Stanley Diamond at 514-484-0100, or e-mail him at SMSDiamond@aol.com.

Nazi crimes have been downgraded in Lithuania

By ESTHER GOLDBERG

Sept. 14, 2001, found me on an Air Canada flight bound for the United Kingdom. I had bought my ticket weeks beforehand; the irony was that Sept. 14 was the first day that planes again took to the sky after 9-11.

I was on my way to Warsaw to celebrate Rosh Hashanah, and to Vilna for Yom Kippur. In between these two holy days was Sept. 23, which in 2001 was the first "National Day of Shame" in Lithuania in memory of the Shoah. Sept. 23, 1943, was the beginning of the end of the Vilna Ghetto, and 2001 was the 60th anniversary of the June 1941 German invasion that brought the Holocaust to Lithuania.

In 2000, Lithuania signed the Stockholm Declaration at the International Forum on the Holocaust, and Great Britain was assigned to oversee Lithuanian remembrance and education of the Shoah. Among the events honouring Sept. 23, 2001, was the launch of the Lithuanian edition of Martin Gilbert's Holocaust history for schools, Never Again, and its presentation to Lithuanian schools by the British government.

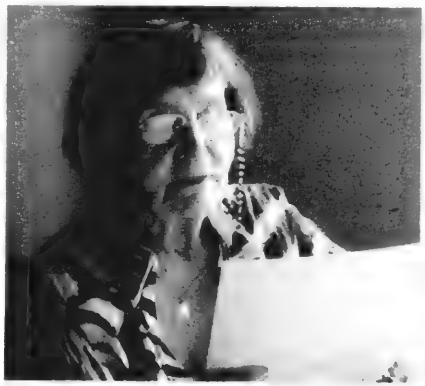
Black ribbons hung from flagpoles on former Jewish buildings throughout Lithuania; markers on the highways pointed to the mass-murder sites of Lithuania's Jews; official programs were held at the killing centres of Ponar, near Vilnius, and the Ninth Fort, near Kaunas; and the rebuilt Jewish Theatre in Vilna was opened as a Museum of Tolerance. It was a day of hope – that this blood-soaked former Soviet Socialist Republic that had struggled to break free of an oppressive and stifling history would change, and look to the West. Even the clocks were reset to European – not Russian – time.

The next day, Sept. 24, taking advantage of those who had come for the commemoration, among them Yitzhak Arad, the former chairman of Yad Vashem, and Gilbert, a meeting of the International Commission for the Evaluation of the Crimes of the Nazi and Soviet Occupation Regimes in Lithuania was held. In the title lies the problem: to Lithuanians today, the crimes of the Soviet regime and the crimes of the Nazi regime are equal. How can this be? The crimes against humanity perpetrated by the Germans and their Lithuanian collaborators, in the form of the hunting down, terrorizing and murder of 90 per cent of Lithuania's Jewish community along with the thousands of Jews who were deported to Lithuania to their deaths, were atrocities of devastating proportion. The crimes against humanity, perpetrated by the Soviet authorities, in the form of the deportation of thousands of Lithuanian citizens – Jews among them – to the gulags of Siberia, along with the 50-year occupation and ruthless rule of Soviet Russia was a tragedy. To its credit, Lithuania was at the forefront of bringing down that Soviet regime.

Where do the Jews fit into the "Nazi and Soviet Occupation Regimes"? Jews were the main victims of Nazi genocide, organized by the 1,000 Einsatzgruppe members assigned to the three Baltic countries, and carried out with the help of local collaborators: 20 battalions of local volunteers in the case of Lithuania. The countries assigned to the Soviet Union with the Molotov-Ribbentrop Nazi-Soviet Non-Aggression Pact of Aug. 23, 1939, were each desperate to regain their own independence. They viewed their Jews as collaborators with the Soviets – from the "Jews and Bolsheviks" propaganda of Hitler's regime – and because individual Jews had been at the forefront of the Bolshevik Revolution in 1917, hoping to get better treatment than they had under the Czars. The fury unleashed by the Lithuanians on the Jews in 1941 was bred-in-the-bone anti-Semitism from the Catholic Church and from the political establishment who saw the Jews as their oppressors.

By combining the examination of the crimes of the Nazi and the Soviet regimes, and by calling the Soviet occupation "genocide," Lithuania has not denied the Holocaust or that one Jew died. Instead it is playing a game of victimhood that is implicit in the Prague Declaration on European Conscience and Communism of June 3 , 2008. It states that "millions of victims of communism and their families are entitled to enjoy justice, sympathy, understanding and recognition for their sufferings, in the same way as the victims of Nazism have been morally and politically recognized." In theory, this sounds fair. In practice, in Lithuania, and in Latvia and Estonia, it has led to frightening developments because the two totalitarian regimes are equated. In effect, the Soviet regime's crimes are upgraded and the Nazi regime's crimes downgraded. The devastation incurred becomes a "double" genocide."

Currently, throughout Lithuania, the plaques on former Jewish buildings and black ribbons are displayed for the "tourist season." Then they come down. But displaying the swastika, a "valuable symbol of the Baltic culture," has been legally allowed in Lithuania's third-largest city, Klaipeda. The state "Genocide Museum" in Vilnius has no reference to the Holocaust – a search on its website has only one mention of Jews, that during the Nazi occupation "about 200,000 Jews were killed in Lithuania, and about 45,000 people of other nationalities were killed," but the "Holocaust Exhibit" part of the Vilna Gaon Jewish State Museum, located at the "Green House," is now closed for renovation – some fear evisceration. Its curator Rachel Kostanian is harassed and continually in fear of losing her job. Even the "National Day of Shame" of 2001 is now called the "National Memorial Day for the Genocide Victims of the Lithuanian Jews." No Lithuanians have been brought to justice for their collaboration efforts in killing Jews, but four elderly Jewish former partisans live in fear of arrest. Reminiscent of George Orwell, some are more equal than others.



Rachel Kostanian is being investigated by Lithuanian authorities. The subject of an essay by Esther Goldberg, which appeared in The CJN's Rosh Hashanah supplement this year, Kostanian has devoted her life to the Green House Holocaust Exhibit in Lithuania and to Holocaust education in Lithuania.

What changed since those hopeful days of September 2001? Was the respect and sensitivity to Jewish suffering, then – as it is now – merely for show, for western visitors, for leaders of important Jewish organizations who are given kavod and when they are gone, the Jew symbols are put away? The Lithuanian elections in 2008 brought Andrius Kubilius back to power, heading a right-wing party composed of a merger of the Union of Political Prisoners and the Exiled and Christianical Democrats, with the Lithuanian National Union. The mood of the country has shifted to the right with the interest in Lithuanian history focused on the trauma of Soviet occupation. Jews do not have an explicit place in that history; instead the implication of Jewish duplicity pervades every aspect of it.

Jews were always a small minority among the leaders, functionaries and secret police of the Lithuanian Communist regime; it was the Lithuanians who imposed communism at every level of society in the Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic. With the current condemnation of communism – but not of their fellow Lithuanians – Jews have become a convenient target. The language of the Prague Declaration reflects this by condemning communism, implying "Jewish communism." The declaration's subtext is that Soviet crimes were essentially Jewish crimes. Yet on the other hand, the Prague Declaration appeals for an equivalency to the way the Holocaust has been "morally and politically recognized." Jews are acknowledged when dead and when honoured by other Jews.

The greatest irony in this situation is the way Jewish partisans are viewed in Lithuania today. Arad fought with Soviet partisans against the German occupiers and has written extensively on his experiences, and on Lithuanian collaboration with the Germans. In 2007, the Lithuanian government asked Israel to extradite Arad for questioning concerning crimes against Lithuanian citizens during his time as a partisan, based on material in his memoir. Israel refused the extradition. The website of the International Commission for the Evaluation of the Crimes of the Nazi and Soviet Occupation Regimes in Lithuania, of whom Arad was a member, now lists him as "suspended," along with Gilbert, who resigned in protest to the "grotesque indignity" of seeking to bring Arad to trial.

Joseph Melamed, a survivor from Kovno and a decorated partisan who has been active with the Israel-based Association of Lithuanian Jews, protested in 1998, at the time the commission was established, against combining the two tragedies. In a letter to then-president Valdas Akamkus, he wrote: "This false symmetry has been a major obstacle to any serious soul-searching by Lithuanian society in regard to the extensive collaboration of Lithuanians with the Nazis in the murder of Lithuanian Jews. Even worse, false accusations and patent exaggerations regarding Jewish participation in Communist crimes against Lithuanians have been adduced time and again to explain, and in some cases even justify, the participation of Lithuanians in the murder of Jews during the Holocaust." Although Melamed lives in Tel Aviv, on Holocaust Remembrance Day this year, Jan. 27, Lithuanian prosecutors visited the Jewish community offices in Vilna to question the leaders of the Jewish community about him.

Rachel Margolis was a former partisan from Vilna, and one of the founders of the Green House Holocaust Exhibit. Her memoir, has, like Arad's, been combed for references – taken out of context – to the killing of Lithuanians. Living in Israel since 2009, she is afraid to return to Lithuania where she may also face arrest.

The fourth aging survivor is Fania Yocheles Brantsovsky, the librarian of the Vilnius Yiddish Institute of Vilnius University and a former partisan. In 2009, she was honoured by the German embassy in Vilnius with the Cross of Merit for strengthening the unity between Germans and Jews of central and eastern Europe. Yet she is under suspicion by the Lithuanians of committing crimes against humanity during her time as a partisan. She travels in Lithuania with a protective "firewall" of ambassadors, from, among other countries, Ireland, Britain, Norway and the United States.

The four survivors under investigation, along with Kostanian, who has devoted her life to the Green House Holocaust Exhibit and to Holocaust education in Lithuania, should be honoured by their fellow Lithuanians as heroes. Instead they are demonized and harassed, castigated and terrorized. This is the "National Shame" that Lithuania should be addressing.

Given the type of Orwellian doublethink that consumes Lithuania today, visiting Jewish dignitaries who come as guests are treated to the treasures of Lithuania that they want to find. When the guests leave, the moral cupboard is bare. For a country and a region emerging into western European civilization, exalting in the freedoms it fought through much of the last century to enjoy, those who care about its people and its history hope it can reconcile the traumas of its past, and build a future that rises above victimhood to embrace tolerance of and appreciation for its Jewish minority.

Esther Goldberg is the creator and editor of three volumes of Holocaust Memoir Digest, published by Vallentine Mitchell, which include Samuel Bak's memoir of Vilna, Painted in Words (www.holocaustmemoirdigest.org).

A related but somewhat different story about the Jews of Lithuania is on page 18.

Peace partner?

The latest round of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians seems to have evoked neither excitement nor hope. The game plan, mired as it is in the baggage of past failures, leaves little room for movement toward the sort of accommodation that's needed to bring a lasting peace to the region. In the past, through the raft of discussions and consultations that have framed one process after another, rejectionism on the part of the Palestinian interlocutors has been a dominant factor in causing such initiatives to flounder. From the time of the 1991 Madrid Conference to the Camp David Summit in 2000, and up until his death in 2004, it was the histrionic and often devious Palestinian Authority president, Yasser Arafat, who was the quintessential spoiler.

Lawrence Herr in Hamilton

Mahmoud Abbas, Arafat's successor, has been touted as a "moderate" (whatever that means in the convoluted vernacular of Middle East politics), but his background and recent utterances point to a somewhat different persona. Here we have someone who was educated in Syria and Russia and whose doctoral thesis focused on what he described as the relationship between Nazism and Zionism and questioned the enormity of the Holocaust.

In his book, Palestine Betrayed (Yale University Press, 2010), historian Efraim Karsh sees unmistakable, and rather ominous, similarities between Arafat and Abbas. Both, he writes, are "warp and woof of the same fabric: dogmatic PLO veterans who have never eschewed their commitment to Israel's destruction and who have viewed the 'peace process' as the continuation by other means of their lifelong war."

And even as the format for the current talks were taking shape, we have seen in Abbas the behavioural traits that fail to engender confidence and that, by putting up deliberate roadblocks, will likely make any progress towards peace no more than an illusion. His rigid adherence to a Palestinian "right of return" to Israel, his failure to disavow Fatah's ongoing commitment to an "armed struggle" and his glorification, recently, of the deceased Mohammed Oudeh, mastermind of the 1972 Munich Olympics massacre, are cases in point, among many others.

But still more troubling are his repeated pronouncements that he would never recognize Israel as a Jewish state. In a conference call with Jewish leaders in late September, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in addressing Abbas' position, drew metaphorical reference to the Nike commercial "Just Do It."

"For the Palestinian leadership," he declared, "it's even simpler: 'Just Say it.'Say that you recognize Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish people."

Abbas' credibility as a peace "partner" may ultimately depend on how he reacts to Netanyahu's challenge on this fundamental precept.

Israel's Jewish character is indelible

In the current round of negotiations, Israel is demanding that the Palestinians recognize it as a Jewish state. This is unnecessary and imprudent. Israel's Jewish nature is irrefutable, and broaching the topic only induces uncertainty about it.

Yair Lowistein in Jerusalem

I'm putting the final touches on this column the day after Yom Kippur. The unique way this most holy of Jewish days is observed in Israel is an apt articulation of how and why this is, in fact, a Jewish country.

To start with, our time is set by the Jewish calendar. On the Saturday night between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, the clock moves back an hour, officially ushering in winter time. The change is designed to "shorten" the fast on Yom Kippur, ending it around 6 p.m., rather than 7.

Starting winter time when we're still in the throes of summer, with daily highs around 30 Celsius, is more than anomalous. Experts say it costs us tens of millions of shekels annually. This year, with the High Holidays being particularly early, a public debate preceded the time change. Tens of thousands signed an online petition demanding, to no avail, that it be delayed.

Now there's talk of possible future solutions. One idea is to change the clocks twice each autumn – once, for a week, around Yom Kippur, and then again, in October, together with the rest of the world. It's right out of the Wise Men of Chelm. What could be more Jewish?

With that issue behind us, it was time to prepare for the holy day. It began with a collective winding down. I live in one of the few areas in Jerusalem that's still predominately secular, but at 2 p.m., three hours before the holiday, a quiet descended as traffic dwindled and families returned home to rest and eat a meal together before the fast.

Statistics released before Rosh Hashanah by the Central Bureau of Statistics shed light on Israelis' level of Jewishness. Nearly two-thirds of Jewish Israelis fast on Yom Kippur, including a quarter of the 40-plus per cent who define themselves as secular.

Even more striking is the level of respect usually unruly Israelis have for this solemn day. As the sun sets on Erev Yom Kippur, traffic comes to a complete standstill. All TV and radio stations shut down, as do the airports. The only vehicles on the roads are police and ambulances. Coming out of synagogue after Kol Nidre, tens of thousands of pedestrians take over the streets, along with another of Israel's distinctive Yom Kippur phenomena – bicycles and skateboards. It's said that pre-Yom Kippur sales at bike stores are the highest of the year. Thousands of kids of all ages enjoy the car-less thoroughfares. Some argue the preponderance of peddlers lessens the sanctity of the day. I find they add to the extraordinary, varied ways in which Israelis observe it.

Yom Kippur is one of my favourite days of the year. I love the quiet and the opportunity for self-examination. I thoroughly enjoy the prayers, discussions, sermons and overflow crowds at my synagogue, Kol Haneshama, Jerusalem's largest Reform shul, which strives to maintain a liberal, pluralistic Jewish voice in this city. But on a more personal level, Yom Kippur is also the day I most miss Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto. Sitting in shul in Jerusalem, I find myself humming the tunes sung so beautifully by Rabbi Avraham Feder and Srul Glick's choir.

After returning home, we have a family meal to break the fast and life floats back to normal. But not so fast. I turn on the TV to catch up on the day's events. After that, Channel 1 – Israel's PBS – broadcasts several documentaries – each telling exceptional stories of bravery, sacrifice and sadness of another Yom Kippur, only 37 years ago, when air-raid sirens disrupted midday prayers and Israel was on the verge of destruction.

That Yom Kippur is etched into Israel's common memory, another reason for continued, collective introspection. It's a different nexus with our Jewish roots.

Our leaders need not insist upon acknowledgement of Israel's Jewish fibre. Our adversaries around the world need no reminder.

Canadian journalists aid demonization campaign

On July 1, the Globe and Mail published a major story (1,100 words) by correspondent Patrick Martin on the Arab-Israeli political advocacy NGO group, Mada al-Carmel. After the Canadian government's International Development Research Centre ended its funding of the group, Mada al-Carmel initiated a lawsuit alleging that this decision was taken "under pressure from the Israeli government" and blamed NGO Monitor for triggering the de-funding. Before the review, Canada gave it more than $800,000, which was 40 per cent of Mada's budget, with the rest from European governments and the New Israel Fund.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

It wasn't a research article and had no detailed analysis or quotes from the numerous documents showing how governmental officials help political NGOs get large grants used to wage political warfare against Israel. These documents illustrate the major defects in the IRDC's approval process and selection of reviewers for political advocacy NGOs.

In contrast, Martin's article relied on quotes from selected individuals. It accepted Mada al-Carmel's self-presentation as a "social research centre" and repeated claims that the IRDC grants were for a study of "the marginalization of women in Arab-Israeli society."

The reality, however, is that Mada's main activity is to promote anti-Israeli propaganda. Martin could have quoted from Mada's "Haifa Declaration," which calls for a "change in the definition of the State of Israel from a Jewish state," and the implementation of a Palestinian "right of return," a euphemism for the end of Israel.

The declaration's authors also accuse Israel of "exploiting [the Holocaust] and its consequences in order to legitimize the right of the Jews to establish a state." They take pride in "the resistance to the military regime put up by our people" and refer to "massacres" committed by the "Zionist movement" and Israel's "policies… in excess of those of the apartheid regime in South Africa."

Instead, Martin's lengthy article centres on Mada's role in an inflammatory NGO campaign called "My Land, Space, Body and Sexuality: Palestinians in the Shadow of the Wall." This activity and accompanying posters had no connection to the "social research" that was the basis for IRDC funding.

Martin admits "that the poster depicts an Israeli soldier with his hand in front of a Palestinian woman's chest and the provocative caption: 'The occupation penetrates her life every day.'" Instead of publishing the image and allowing readers to judge for themselves, the Globe and Mail misleadingly told readers that the insinuation of Israeli sexual harassment was incorrect.

In addition to justifying IRDC funding and Mada's activities, Martin's article also includes a highly distorted presentation of the role and activities of NGO Monitor, which I head. Our standard letter of inquiry to the IRDC requesting clarification of the published information regarding Mada funding reportedly triggered the Canadian government's belated review and the subsequent funding cut-off. But in Mada's version, the process is far more sinister.

Regarding the activities of NGO Monitor, the use of documents would have presented a far more accurate picture, in comparison to the problematic quotes from individuals seeking to protect the NGO network. In addition to misrepresenting the Mada al-Carmel/IRDC case, the Globe article repeated the false claims regarding NGO Monitor's role in changes in the Rights and Democracy organization in Canada, as well as Ottawa's funding for KAIROS. (Under the cover of development assistance, this church group has a radical political agenda, including backing divestment campaigns targeting Israel.) In the conspiracy fantasy, these decisions are part of "all-out assault on legitimate human rights groups" being promoted by the Netanyahu government.

These distorted reports aren't limited to the Globe and Mail. On April 9, Radio-Canada's television magazine Une heure sur terre presented an outrageously distorted story, also without any documentation or research. The pattern is also reflected in articles in the Toronto Star and Maclean's.

The story of the IRDC's highly problematic funding process for radical NGOs such as Mada al-Carmel is still emerging, and, in addition to the court case, NGO Monitor will soon publish detailed documentation. The Globe and Mail and the rest will then have another opportunity to get the details right.

Mideast peace remains a fond dream

"We've been here before, and we know how difficult the road ahead will be."

These wise and prescient words were uttered by Hillary Clinton, the U.S. secretary of state, about a month ago, just as Israel and the Palestinian Authority resumed peace negotiations under American auspices after a 20-month hiatus.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Like her husband, Bill, the former president of the United States who tried but failed to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict, Clinton was acutely aware that the path toward peace is a long and winding one, full of potholes that can upend even the most serious of peacemaking efforts.

Clinton and her boss, President Barack Obama, harboured hopes that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would either renew Israel's politically-charged 10-month partial moratorium on construction in West Bank settlements or, at a minimum, extend it by two to three months.

But on Sept 26, to the relief and jubilation of Jewish settlers and their vocal supporters in Netanyahu's coalition government, it expired, touching off a spate of building throughout the West Bank and calling into question whether talks can proceed, much less succeed.

Netanyahu's interlocutor, President Mahmoud Abbas, had insistently declared that negotiations would not continue, even for "a single day," if Israel refused to renew the partial settlement freeze, which was thrust upon Netanyahu by intense U.S. lobbying.

Fearing that the the Palestinians might pull out of the talks and thus render them still-born, Obama and Clinton urged Netanyahu to prolong the partial moratorium, which excluded eastern Jerusalem and public buildings in existing settlements. Their calls were echoed by the president of Egypt, Hosni Mubarak, and the king of Jordan, Abdullah II, who participated in the ceremonial opening of the peace talks in Washington, D.C.

Beholden to coalition partners who opposed the moratorium in the first place and expressed deep reservations about a two-state solution as a basis for negotiations, Netanyahu decided that his political survival took precedence over the continuation of talks with the Palestinians.

Not even his confidant, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, the leader of the Labor party faction who had advocated an extension, could dissuade Netanyahu.

The logic of Barak's position, shared by Obama and Clinton, was clear. If the partial moratorium was extended by several months, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators might be able to define the borders of a Palestinian state and thereby defuse a major irritant that has defied resolution for decades – the maze of settlements erected by Israel beyond the old Green Line since the Six Day War. Once a border was drawn, the thinking went, Israel could build as it pleased without damaging repercussions.

This consideration, important as it is to Israel's future as a Jewish state and its bilateral relations with the Palestinians, the United States and the Arab world, was shunted aside as Netanyahu – a self-styled moderate who claimed he sought a "historic compromise" and intended to "confound the critics and the skeptics" – let the partial moratorium expire.

So now, at least for the present, the onus is on Abbas, who repeatedly warned that settlements and peace are incompatible, who strenuously argued that settlements are illegal under international law and prejudge the outcome of talks, and who continually threatened to walk out if the partial building ban ended.

In the immediate aftermath of Netanyahu's decision, Abbas came under unremitting pressure from the United States to stick with the talks. In a nod to Washington, he said that a renewal of settlement construction would not necessarily scuttle negotiations and that the breakdown of talks would not lead to a resurgence of violence. But last week, the Palestinian leadership, backed by Egypt and Jordan, suspended talks. The issue is to be further debated when the Arab League – which has pressed Abbas to adopt a hard line toward Israeli settlements – confers in Libya on Oct. 8.

Amid this crisis, the United States is desperately trying to salvage the talks, which are subject to a one-year deadline. The Obama administration has reportedly offered Israel an incentive package of security guarantees and assurances in exchange for a continuation of the moratorium, which Netanyahu had offered as a one-time gesture. Washington is pushing for a solution, eager to improve relations with the Muslim world, rally Arab public opinion against Iran's militarized nuclear program and anxious to stabilize Iraq and Afghanistan.

With U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton looking on, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu greets Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas at a meeting in Sharm al Sheikh, Egypt.

The latest round of talks, which also took place in Sharm el Sheik and Jerusalem, got off to a promising start in rhetorical terms as Netanyahu described Abbas as his "partner in peace," as both sides proclaimed an interest in achieving a breakthrough through concessions and as chief U.S. intermediary, George Mitchell, claimed that Israel and the Palestinians were addressing "the tough issues."

Behind the rosy and uplifting spin, however, yawning and probably unbridgeable gaps loomed large, obstacles that may well scupper the chances for a pragmatic accommodation.

Netanyahu, who in 2009 finally accepted the notion of a two-state solution without spelling out its crucial geographic dimensions, entered the talks with three fundamental demands: Israel must control the Jordan Valley – the gateway to a Palestinian state on its eastern frontier – as well as settlement blocs near Jerusalem and Jewish neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem. The Palestinians must recognize Israel as a Jewish state and shelve all territorial claims and declare a definitive end to the century-old dispute with Israel.

The Palestinians' demands, which were equally rigorous, called for an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 armistice lines – which represent only 22 percent of pre-1948 Palestine – and for equitable land swaps to compensate for Israel's intended annexation of certain parts of the West Bank. Drawing a line in the sand, the Palestinian prime minister, Salam Fayyad, said that he would not accept a truncated "Mickey Mouse" Palestinian state.

The Palestinian leadership also called for negotiations to start from the point they left off in December 2008, when the then Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, agreed to an Israeli withdrawal from about 93 percent of the West Bank and compensatory land swaps.

The Gaza Strip, which has been in Hamas' hands since a violent coup in the summer of 2007, was left out of the proposed deal.

In addition, the Palestinians insisted on a mutually agreeable resolution of the Palestinian refugee problem, which has festered through innumerable skirmishes, seven Arab-Israeli wars and two Palestinian uprisings.

As the talks got under way in September, the media reported that few of Israel's and the Palestinians' respective demands were acceptable, leaving little or no room for compromise.

Israel's foreign minister, Avigdor Lieberman, a settler himself, muddied the waters. He ruled out the prospect of peace in this generation and proposed an interim agreement instead. Iran, as usual, vilified a rapprochement as a sellout to vital Palestinian interests.

Hamas' refusal to recognize Israel and renounce terrorism, combined with Israel's rejection of a long-term truce with Hamas and the absence of a united Palestinian front, deepens the impasse and makes the possibility of a viable peace agreement virtually impossible.

Hamas, having bitterly denounced the very concept of peace talks, attempted to sabotage them by launching three attacks in the West Bank that claimed the lives of four Jewish settlers. In another unmistakable signal of defiance, Hamas permitted like-minded radical groups to fire Qassam rockets at Israel from bases in Gaza. In response, Israel beefed up its forces in the West Bank, killed a Hamas commander there and bombed smuggling tunnels in Gaza.

Given the confluence of these events, peace, remains little more than a fond dream.

Meet The Romspen Fund's Second Largest Investor

As one of the founders of the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, Arthur Resnick knows many, many investors. Arthur doesn't just sell units in the Fund, he helps manage it. But perhaps most important to Arthur's success and future is the large number of Fund units that he has personally purchased.

Arthur Resnick knows full well how important the monthly income distributed by the Fund is to its 2000 investors, including himself, his family and friends. Meet Arthur and Romspen's management team at the next Introductory Seminar.

Vaughan Ward 5 candidates target taxes, transit

Bernard Green

Vernon Hendrickson

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporters

This week's municipal election coverage focuses on Ward 5 in the City of Vaughan.

According to the City of Vaughan website, the "City Above Toronto" has a population of nearly 280,000 and is home to some 24,000 Jews, many of whom live in Ward 5. Unofficial estimates peg the Jewish population of the ward somewhere between 50 and 70 per cent.

The ward is bounded to the north by Hwy. 7, to the east by Yonge Street, to the south by Steeles Avenue and to the west by sections of the Canadian National Railway and Dufferin Street.

There are six candidates vying to represent the ward on council: Bernard Green, an accountant; Vernon Hendrickson, an insurance broker; Gila Martow, an optometrist; Stellios Missirlis, a consultant; Yehuda Shahaf, a businessman; and Alan Shefman, the incumbent.

The CJN asked each candidate the following question: What are your priorities for the ward if you are elected?

Bernard Green: Vaughan voters are very concerned about waste at City Hall and tax increases. Taxes have gone up 30 per cent in the last seven years. I don't think that's reasonable. There are ways to start reducing these increases. We can do better.

We also need to stop the infighting on council and raise the image of Vaughan.

I also want to hold a conference on traffic congestion and bring in consultants to share their knowledge. A great solution would be to extend the Yonge subway line north of Steeles. But this is costly and something that's not being pushed hard right now, but it should be.

I want to see recycling programs continue and expand in the ward, as I'm fully in support of environmental initiatives. As for Jewish community concerns, I want to find compromises and solutions to the community's problems, but in a low-key way. We can often deal with these issues behind the scenes instead of having them blown up in public.

Vernon Hendrickson: My platform is about fixing traffic congestion... commercial and residential development improvement, congestion issues affecting the environment and waste management issues.

We're talking about getting a subway up. It's not going to happen tomorrow. Meanwhile, you have to do something about traffic congestion. Some people say open up an extra lane, widen the street.

You want to tell me you can't locate a nice area in the ward where quite a few cars could park? Then you have one bus lane, straight down to the Finch subway. You have four or five buses running regularly from the parking lot. You don't have to build an extra lane, one could be designated to the buses.

Gila Martow: I would say that the top concern of the residents right now is the traffic and how the traffic is going to be affected by high-density development. Thornhill has been... under discussion to have the subway expand north on Yonge Street. Finally, a year ago, we were told it's approved. Now they're not moving forward. Instead, they've decided to bring the subway to Vaughan off Jane Street. In the meantime, there's highrise development focused on Steeles Avenue and Bathurst Street near Promenade Mall. I'm questioning why there's highrise development in the east while the subway expansion is to the west.

There's very little openness on city council and money is spent on projects that make little sense to the residents.

Municipal Vote 2010

City of Vaughan home to some 24,000 Jews

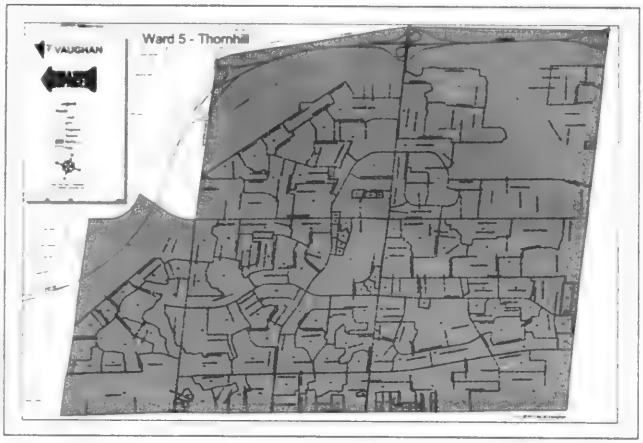
We have a lot of potential in our ward with the Thornhill Historic Village near Yonge and Centre streets. We have some beautiful heritage buildings there.

It would be very nice if we made a bit of an effort to put up street lamps to reflect the area better. It can be done with benches, outdoor coffee or gourmet ice cream places. People would love to walk there.

Stellios Missirlis: My priorities are to lower taxes or make sure the taxes do not get really high and transparency in the city politics. Every time there's a tax increase. You have to make sure you get some sort of different ways of funding the expenses and make sure the head count in city hall remains properly adjusted, meaning no more hires, when you can justify that. It's on a case-by-case basis. You have to control the expenditures and ensure there's transparency in the contracts.

The best way to encourage business growth is to give incentives. Lower the taxes and provide a climate that they can get things done quickly without too many bureaucratic hassles

Constituents have to make sure they contact me in any possible way and raise their concerns. Also, we should have some sort of communication on an ongoing basis. It could be a mailing list and a website.



Yehuda Shahaf: My main idea is to label a stretch of Bathurst Street as Little Israel, to turn the ward into something resembling areas such as Little Italy, Little Portugal or Chinatown. This is an idea to target Jews and Israelis in the ward to help them build the area and be involved.

Our ward is going to change. It's becoming more urban. We have to develop it with many small businesses and offices for professionals, to bring money to our area instead of it leaving the area.

We need to improve quality of life in the area. For example, there are a lot of condos being built, and we have to make a bylaw to enforce builders to dedicate half the main floors for public and commercial usage. Also, I want to force builders to make pick-up and drop-off areas in the back of buildings instead of the front of buildings.

There are almost 500,000 people waiting in Thornhill and Richmond Hill for the Yonge subway extension. But the planned subway extension from York University to Vaughan Mills won't help our traffic. We need to take the York subway line budget and transfer it for the Yonge subway extension.

Alan Shefman: I want to continue to provide the most timely and efficient response to residents in the community.

People talk about services and lowering taxes. But there are complexities to managing a large city. It's a balance. We need to keep taxes low, but maintain and enhance services.

I will continue to help expand our libraries and build more community centres.

My priority is to improve rapid transit in our community, with my major project as the Yonge subway extension. We're putting pressure on the federal and provincial governments to lobby for this... and working on alternative funding approaches.

Over the last six years, I've seen a remarkable response from the city on Jewish community issues. I don't think anyone plans anything in Vaughan without first contacting my office to make sure we don't make plans on Jewish holidays. In Ward 5, it's likely 60 to 70 per cent of the population is Jewish. I want to solve problems and help the community go forward as well as continue working with York Regional Police to help them understand the Jewish community's security issues.

Number Four in a Series New Challenges. Eternal Strength.

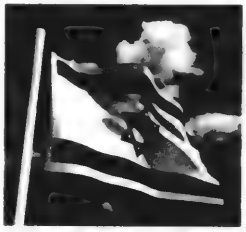
FREEDOM AND TOLERANCE SPOKEN HERE.



Throughout history, the Jewish People have endured unimaginable hardships that threatened our values and Jewish existence itself. We have survived them all. Today, with the same steadfast determination, we cherish our values and stand strongly against new threats.

A global movement is denying Jewish Peoplehood, questioning Israel's right to exist, while ignoring her values of freedom and tolerance. Our community has an historic opportunity to reaffirm those values.

Your support will allow UJA Federation to fund bold programs that strengthen Jewish identity and encourage more of our young people to experience Israel, inspiring a new spirit of Jewish activism.

Let's work together to keep our youth proud and strong.

Shaarei Tefillah rabbi marks 30 years at shul's pulpit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Moshe Stern, spiritual leader of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, says that some people in the community consider him a zealot or a fanatic for his views on Israel.

But, he said, "if zealotry, or even fanaticism, means caring profoundly about the future of Israel and its security, and the need to maintain the boundaries of the Land of Israel as dictated in the Torah… that, I will never apologize for. Never."

The 67-year-old rabbi, who is as down-to-earth and affable in manner as he is passionate about his beliefs, is being honoured with his wife, Sarah, at a gala dinner at the synagogue on Oct. 28. The event marks 30 years since he began leading the congregation, which has about 400 member families.

In an interview at Shaarei Tefillah in the small study overflowing with books, Judaica and memorabilia that Rabbi Stern calls his cubbyhole, he reflected on Judaism, Israel and life.

But first and foremost, he wanted to talk about his wife, who he noted is "very involved in the chesed aspect of the synagogue.

"She is very much part of what I do," he said of Sarah, who taught at Bais Yaakov High School. "I always remind the people here they got two for the price of one."

The Sterns "grew up together," the rabbi said, referring to the early years of their marriage, which began when she was 19 and he was 22. Last year, they became great-grandparents when their great-grandson Yair was born in London, England.

The rabbi received his smichah (rabbinic ordination) at his wedding ceremony from the late Rabbi Isaac Schwei and Rabbi Pinchas Hirschprung of Montreal's Rabbinical College of Canada, Lubavitcher Yeshiva.

A native of Montreal whose paternal grandfather was a rabbi and whose father was a pedlar, Rabbi Stern attended the yeshiva, then an outreach institution, as a child. He is also an alumnus of Baron Byng High School on St. Urbain Street and went on to study at Sir George Williams University, the University of Georgia and the University of Alabama. He has degrees in political science and philosophy.

Rabbi Moshe Stern

"I studied constantly," Rabbi Stern recalls. "I wanted to get out into the world."

In 1965, he began his career with a three-year stint as an assistant rabbi in Savannah, Ga., before taking on his first pulpit in Mountain Brook, Ala., a suburb of Birmingham.

"My intention, in all honesty, was to be there for a short period of time," he said. "The short stay turned into 12 years."

When the Sterns' oldest daughter reached bat mitzvah age, they realized they needed to be in "a more mature" Jewish community with a Jewish high school.

The rabbi says his approach to congregants hasn't changed over the years. "My outlook in the rabbinate is teaching and hopefully inspiring people to become more knowledgeable Jews… and to show them that one can live an Orthodox, traditional, observant lifestyle in this modern technological world."

He said he is proud that Shaarei Tefillah is "an inclusive kind of family synagogue" that welcomes everyone, regardless of their level of observance.

A remark he made in this paper in an Aug. 12 article might indicate otherwise, and the rabbi raised the issue himself during the interview.

Commenting on a statement of principles calling for the acceptance of gays in the Orthodox community, Rabbi Stern told The CJN at the time that although he didn't sign the document, he welcomes everyone into his shul. "I accept homosexuals into my shul like I accept any sinners," he said.

In retrospect, he reflected, "maybe I might have said it a little differently." However, he said he doesn't regret "the general concept" of his words.

"[Acting on homosexual feelings] is a sin. The non-observance of Shabbat is a sin. The non-observance of kashrut is a sin… The basic point is that [homosexuality] should not prohibit anyone from coming to a shul."

Speaking in more general terms about his shul, he said the congregants are "kind and generous and giving and respectful."

Among the changes he has seen over the course of his rabbinate, he said that synagogues have become "primary as a place of education" and "secondary as a place of prayer."

"It has always been a place to pray, but… it has now become the function of the synagogue to educate a younger generation of Jews who have not been exposed to the kind of Jewish education that they should have been as children. We are, in a sense, filling a void."

Shaarei Tefillah offers classes virtually every night, he added. This was not the norm when he started out.

Rabbi Stern takes particular pride in the shul's Israel-related programs. "The very least we can do is to speak up and defend, – every way we know how – the cause of Israel."

For the rabbi, that has meant, among other things, participating in demonstrations and spending a night in jail in 1981 with the late Rabbi Meir Kahane, founder of the Jewish Defence League (JDL), when Rabbi Kahane was arrested after speaking at Shaarei Tefillah.

"I didn't necessarily agree with everything he said, but I was enamoured by his personal self-sacrifice for Israel."

Rabbi Stern, who has marched with the JDL but is not officially affiliated with the group, said he "would never advocate anything beyond peaceful demonstrating." But, he said, he is fully supportive of Israel using military power when necessary.

A past president of the Va'ad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, Rabbi Stern is a member of the board of governors of B'nai Brith Canada, and is also involved with Canadian Magen David Adom.

New principal followed Penna's progress from afar

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As a Jewish educator in the United States, Rhonda Rosenheck had been following the progress of Toronto's Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School for years, never imagining that she would end up running it.

"I thought it was interesting to watch the school grow up," said Rosenheck, who moved here from New Jersey at the end of the summer to become its principal.

Rhonda Rosenheck

She succeeds Janet Nish-Lapidus, who is retiring. Nish-Lapidus remained at the school until Sept. 29 to ease the transition, because Rosenheck had committed to working for the summer at the Isabella Freedman Jewish Retreat Center in Connecticut, running its internship program.

"I think a compelling factor in my interest in the school was the real celebration of diversity in its population and potential population," Rosenheck said.

The Penna school – subject of a 2008 book by Alex Pomson and Randal Schnoor, Jewish Day School in the Lives of Adult Jews – is unique for its non-traditional location away from the suburbs, and for its diverse student body. With almost 160 students from senior kindergarten to Grade 8, its community includes same-sex and intermarried parents, single-parent families, and children with a variety of ethnic and racial backgrounds.

One of the reasons the 12-year-old school's celebration of diversity, not just tolerance, resonated for Rosenheck is her own background, she said.

A self-described "mutt, Jewishly," Rosenheck said her mother's family was Orthodox, and her father, a photographer, was "a New York labour union, anti-religion Zionist." Her family attended a Conservative congregation, and her mother, a social worker, taught Hebrew school in a Reform congregation while Rosenheck was growing up on Long Island.

As well, she added, her maternal grandfather was from Salonika and had a minimal Jewish background, while her grandmother was Orthodox.

"You have to learn how to bridge that difference and still be cohesive," she said.

A budding entrepreneur in the early 1980s, Rosenheck – who studied English literature and took a few business courses as an undergraduate at Binghamton University– stumbled into Jewish education unexpectedly when she was teaching Hebrew school to earn some extra money.

"To my shock and horror, my enthusiasm for business diminished in direct proportion to the amount of time I had to spend on teaching."

Rosenheck, 48, who has been involved in Jewish education since 1983, also has a master's degree in Jewish education from the Jewish Theological Seminary and has participated in educational programs through Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the Mandel Teacher Education Institute in Ohio and the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem.

But she says she has remained entrepreneurial in the educational field. Prior to her most recent position as education director for a company creating online Jewish educational programming, Rosenheck co-founded the Schechter Regional High School in New Jersey, was principal of the Ivry Prozdor High School in New York, and served as consulting head of school for a Long Island day school that was about to close.

"A community at a point where there's growth and change is exciting for me," she said.

But Rosenheck also takes pleasure in the smaller things, such as her interactions with children seeking approval for a project or even a brief respite in her office.

As well, to her delight, students at Penna call her by her first name. "I've always wanted to just be called 'Rhonda,'" she said. "I've never found it to impede the level of respect that I got."

Rosenheck's main goal now is to implement the board's decision to "grow the school," which has acquired more space in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, where it is housed. This winter, the space will be renovated and turned into classrooms, Rosenheck said.

As well, she added, part of the plan is to strengthen Penna's nascent middle school as "a compelling component" of the school.

The Jews of Lithuania

By D'ARCY MCGEE
Special to The CJN

Paneriai! The very name of this small Lithuanian town, 10 kilometres outside Vilnius – the capital – conjures up horrifying visions. For it was in an otherwise beautiful pine forest outside the town that Nazi occupiers of Lithuania brutally murdered and buried the bodies of some 100,000 people including 70,000 Jews, in seven large pits and three trenches in what the Lithuanian poet S. Bistrickas describes as a "kingdom of death."

There was a pervasive silence as my Lithuanian friend and I walked in a cool rain along the pathway linking the pits and memorials. We thought about the men, women and children. They stood here in line – waiting – for their turn to be killed by a bullet in the back of the head, for their bodies to be piled up in the pits, deep fuel storage tanks built by Red Army soldiers. Later, as German forces began to retreat from the Soviet Union in 1943, the Nazis attempted to hide their crimes by exhuming the bodies, burning the remains, pulverizing the bones, mixing the ashes with sand, and pouring them back in the pits.

"I feel very upset," my friend whispered. "I can feel their souls around me. I couldn't help them." All we could see were circles of wet green grass marking the sites of the pits. All we could hear was the gentle wind blowing through the pines and the sound of rain drops.

Nearby was a small group of mourners from Poland grieving at the memorial constructed to honour soldiers of the Armija Krajowa, and other Polish victims also murdered and buried here.

The Synagogue in Kaunas

The bullets and flames of Paneriai erased nearly six centuries of rich Jewish culture, which had flourished in Lithuania since Grand Duke Vytautas introduced the Charter of Privileges, granting Jews the same rights and privileges as other free people of the Grand Duchy. With the murder of over 90 per cent of its Jewish population, Vilnius seemed to have lost its title of "the Jerusalem of Lithuania," a vibrant centre of Orthodox Jewish learning and culture.

The return of the Red Army, thrusting the country back into the embrace of the Soviet Union, was hardly reassuring to surviving Lithuanian Jews, or to most other Lithuanians. It was during the Soviet period that the Great Synagogue was destroyed, graves desecrated and all religious activities banned.

As devastating as the Nazi occupation and Soviet rule had been for Lithuanian Jews, known as Litvaks, independence of Lithuania in 1991 and its entry into the European Union, represented important developments for the community. "Since independence, there have been big positive changes," Faina Kukliansky, vice-chair of the Jewish community of Lithuania told me. "Overall, official policies of the government have been very supportive."

Challenges remain. Issues related to the restitution of Jewish communal and private property continue unresolved. The Jewish community's recovery from its brutal near annihilation is still fragile. But signs of revitalization are tangible.

At the heart of this recovery is the Vilna Gaon State Jewish Museum, named for the great Jewish scholar, Elijah ben Solomon Zalman (1720-1797), known as the Genius of Vilnius (Vilna Gaon). The institution – largely financed by Lithuania's Ministry of Culture – comprises five separate entities: the Paneriai Memorial Site; The Holocaust Exhibition (Green House), which was reopened on September 10; the Historical Exhibitions and Administration; the Tolerance Centre; and the Lipschutz Memorial Museum in Druskininkai, which is currently closed for renovations until 2012.

Deputy director, Dr. Kamile Rupeikaite, told me that the museum's Tolerance Centre "must reach out to the broader Lithuanian community. We know that anti-Semitism is alive here. We need to counter this with programs that attract support outside the Jewish community in Lithuania."

The centre's outreach programs are positive endeavours to introduce works of history, art and music, not just because they are Jewish, but because they offer significant historical and artistic merit and interest.

Rupeikaite pointed out the centre's cultural hall has hosted major musical events, including a Klezmer band from Chicago, an exhibition of some works of American artist Man Ray, and a concert by the chief cantor of Vienna. "We have to offer quality," she stated.

The Tolerance Centre's museum is a must-see for any visitor to Vilnius. We attended the official opening of a new exhibit of the works of Litvak artist Lasar Segall, on loan from the Museum of Jewish Art and History in Paris. The Tolerance Centre museum offers a rich array of Jewish art, cultural and liturgical objects, including important fragments and objects from the Great Synagogue, which was damaged during World War II.

Rather than restore the venerable edifice, Soviet authorities demolished it, along with the prayer house of the Vilna Gaon, the Strashun Library and other historic buildings of the Jewish Quarter between 1950 and 1957.

Still, many buildings and streets of the former Jewish Quarter remain in Vilnius' vibrant Old Town, a UNESCO Heritage site. The Vilna Gaon Jewish State Museum has published a wonderful small book, Vilnius: 100 Sites of Jewish History and Culture, which is an informative and interesting guide for visitors to the city. Copies can be obtained at the Tolerance Centre on Naugarduko Street, or at the Vilnius Jewish Culture and Information Center on Mesiniu Street.

Jewish Life

From tragedy to hope

The monument at Paneriai
[Photos by D'Arcy McGee]

Among the many surviving buildings is the Choral Synagogue at Pymlio Street 39, built in 1903, and now the only functioning synagogue in Vilnius. It was in the synagogue that we enjoyed a marvellous evening concert of Jewish liturgical and folk music, sung by great international singers

The Soviet regime destroyed the original Jewish cemetery, dating from the 15th century and located on the right bank of the Neris River. The remains of the Vilna Gaon were transferred to the current cemetery in Sheshkine Suderves kelias Street. There a mausoleum housing the Gaon's remains stands as a memorial to the spiritual and intellectual leader of the Litvaks

Following independence, the government of Lithuania unveiled a plaque on the house at 3 Zhydu Street in Old Town, adjacent to the site of the Gaon's home. Nearby, the government also commissioned a sculpture, entitled Jewish Sage, which marks the site of his home, near the Great Synagogue.

The Soviets also destroyed the second Jewish cemetery in Uzhupis between 1961 and 1963, using the gravestones for construction projects. The Jewish community of Lithuania commissioned a very moving memorial at the site, financed by the U.S. Commission for the preservation of America's Heritage Abroad with funds donated by American Litvaks and the city of Vilnius. The monument, using gravestones which the Soviets had used to construct a pedestrian stairway, was unveiled in 2004.

The Jewish heritage in Lithuania is by no means confined to the city of Vilnius. Scattered in small towns and villages are at least a dozen small wooden synagogues. Most are in very bad condition, like the one that we visited in the town of Zhiezhmariai, east of Kaunas, Lithuania's second largest city and capital during the interwar years. (Perhaps there is a project here for the Canadian Jewish/Litvak community.)

Kaunas was a delightful surprise – an interesting, beautiful and culturally rich city, definitely underrated as a tourist destination, even within Lithuania. Unfortunately, our time in the city was limited, and we were unable to visit the once vibrant Jewish ghetto or the infamous Ninth Fort Museum, a prison used by the Soviets as a holding station for thousands of Lithuanian prisoners awaiting transportation to the Siberian Gulag, and during the Nazi occupation as a place of execution for some 5,000 Jews and others. And the Kaunas Choral Synagogue was closed when we went to see its striking black and gold interior and its memorial to the 1,600 Jewish children executed at the Ninth Fort.

Our visit to the Sugihara Centre was a highlight of our visit to Kaunas. It was here in the summer of 1940 in the office of the Japanese Consulate, that Consul General Chiune Sugihara saved the lives of some 6,000 Jews by issuing transit visas for passage to Japan and rail transportation across the Soviet Union. During a one-month period, Sugihara worked 18 hours a day, overcoming impediments thrown up by Nazi spies and by the Soviet authorities who, in June, had moved in to occupy Lithuania and ordered the closure of all foreign missions in the country. He also had to deal with indifference and opposition within the Japanese government. However, he received major support from the Netherlands Consul, Jan Zwartendijk, who issued visas indicating the Netherlands territory of Curacao as the final destination of the refugees, an essential step to validate the temporary transit visas to Japan. However, none of the refugees ended up in Curacao.

After the war, Sugihara retired from the Japanese diplomatic service. A humble man, neither he nor his wife Yukiko spoke publicly of the events of 1940 in Kaunas. It was not until some survivors located the "Japanese Schindler" that the world began to hear of his remarkable achievements. In 1985, a year before his death, the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial Institute in Jerusalem recognized Sugihara by granting him its "Righteous Among the Nations" honour. It granted the same honour posthumously to Zwartendijk in 1997.

In 1999, the Sugihara Foundation, a private foundation, opened the museum in the former Consulate at 30 Vaizhganto Street, which the Soviets had previously converted into an apartment building. The diplomat's widow visited in 2001 and planted four cherry trees in front of the building. While we were visiting, a busload of Japanese tourists arrived. The manager, Ramunas Janulaitis, told me that over 90 per cent of the centre's visitors are from Japan.

I return from Lithuania with many emotions – wonderful memories of its people, its rich history and culture, beautiful Baltic coast dunes and beaches, and vibrant cities. But there are also memories of the horrors inflicted on the country, especially its Jewish community, by the double tragedies of the Holocaust and Soviet occupation.

Much has changed. Vilnius may no longer be the Jerusalem of Lithuania. But Lithuania has been free and independent for 20 years. In 2004 it became a member state of the European Union. Problems persist both for Lithuania and its Jewish community. But both are moving forward – interdependently, and as part of a broader European fabric.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Giving something back

By RABBI MORDECAI ZEITZ

Rabbinic Reflections

After the excitement of Creation there is trouble, not only in Paradise but even outside – "Vatimaleh ha'aretz chamas" (and the earth was filled with treachery and robbery). God suffered in silence for 10 generations and then Noah was chosen to be the bridge between the old and the new. He and his family, together with pairs of other species, would be the forerunners of a renewed creation.

It's hard to imagine that the entire civilization was corrupt. Is it possible that everyone was a robber or a highwayman? The punishment of the flood was a result of chamas, robbery, but what was was stolen that brought down an entire civilization?

Well, maybe there is a form of robbery that does affect and infect a total societal mindset, a form of chamas that affects all humankind, thus destroying the very worthiness of life.

While this idea is hard to conceive, just consider what a robber does? He/she takes. They take what they feel is coming to them. There is no respect of property. The rationalization: it's out there, so why shouldn't I have some of it?

We would all agree this is criminal. But it applies to not only material things that don't belong to us, but also to a wide range of ongoing experiences in life that we assume are coming to us. Chamas is the act of taking rather than giving, of expecting things and assuming that this is the way it's supposed to be.

Do we automatically take the blessings of daily life without giving or offering something in return, whether it be just a thank you or a blessing? Are the good things in life coming to me because I assume that's the way it ought to be? Simple things like getting up in the morning, the blessings of good health and welfare, food on the table and a roof over my head, a family to enjoy, self-respect and esteem, a solution to a problem or some naches from something. These are actually gifts to be cherished.

The crime is not in the taking but in our failure to give something back in return. Sharing our good fortune; helping someone; being grateful to those who surround us; recognizing the role of community in our well-being and giving something back; taking time to honour, through prayer and celebration, our ultimate Provider.

And so Noah and his family were placed in the ark. True, they got salvation from the flood, but there was a basic lesson to be learned: the challenge, the creation of a renewed world without chamas. To create a society wherein, if you are fortunate enough to receive, then you know full well that you should give something back in return.

The famous biblical ark is not just a rescue vehicle, but is, in fact, a mini-schoolhouse. On board, the "survivors" had to feed and care for all the animals. Just as in real life there is no free ride, the takers became givers, the foundation of the new tomorrow.

The continuing lesson of Noah is that the world will continue to thrive only if I learn to balance my taking and receiving with my giving and sharing. Chamas, then and now, is a reflection of a world of takers. It is a just and lasting society that transforms takers into givers, and as we give, so shall we receive in return. Shabbat Shalom.

The burning of books

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

There is nothing new about the censorship and burning of books. Rev. Terry Jones, the Florida minister who drew international attention recently with his threatened burning of the Qur'an, has a lot of company.

Consider the Qur'an. Muslims believe that it was revealed by God to the Prophet Muhammad, transmitted over time by the Angel Gabriel, beginning in 610 CE until the Prophet's death in 632 CE.

The Qu'ran preaches the oneness of God. He is the creator of Heaven and Earth, of life and death. It also emphasizes God's divine mercy and compassion. As his omnipotence is tempered with justice, he is forgiving to the sinner who repents.

This hallowed book provides the basic rules of conduct fundamental to the Muslim way of life. This religion took on the title of Islam because Allah decreed in the Qur'an, "Lo the religion with Allah is al-Islam [the surrender] to his will and guidance."

When the Arabic text of the Qu'ran was first published in Europe in 1530, Pope Clement VII ordered it burned. Latin translations of the Qu'ran were prohibited by the Spanish Inquisition, a ban that remained in effect until 1790.

The Talmud is a multi-volume collection of teachings, laws and debates that were set down by Jewish sages in Palestine and Iraq over a period of 700 years, ending in 500 CE. Its importance to Judaism is second only to the Torah.

In 1244, Pope Innocent IV ordered Louis IX of France to burn all copies of the Talmud. This order was repeated in 1248, when 20 wagon loads of books were burned in Paris, and again in 1254.

In 1490 in Spain, the Grand Inquisitor Torquemada burned scores of Hebrew books by order of Ferdinand and Isabella; he later conducted at Salmanca an auto-da-fé, or burning, of more than 6,000 volumes. Active suppression of the Talmud by the Catholic Church lasted through the 18th century.

Soon after Moses Maimonides' death in 1204, his Guide of the Perplexed sparked furious controversy. Orthodox Jewish opponents objected to Maimonides' sympathy for Aristotelian thought, which was considered fundamentally incompatible with Hebrew tradition. They stressed the impossibility of being both a believer and a philosopher, contending that religion proscribed theoretical inquiry.

In 1232, in Montpellier, France, the learned talmudist Solomon ben Abraham led an attack on The Guide of the Perplexed and obtained the support of the rabbis of France and some of the important scholars of Spain. The work was banned from Jewish homes under penalty of excommunication.

In 1233, Dominican friars burned The Guide at the request of Jewish leaders. Three hundred years later, The Guide was again condemned by the influential yeshiva of Lublin, Poland. The work still faced bans as late as the 19th century.

In 1933, in the first of the infamous Nazi bonfires, students from the University of Berlin gathered 25,000 volumes by Jewish and other denounced authors that were consigned to the flames. Similar demonstrations took place in other German universities.

As a fitting conclusion to this essay, I offer a number of brief quotations. Thomas Jefferson wrote, "If the book be false in its facts, disprove them; if false in its reasoning, debate it. But for God's sake, let's hear freely from all sides."

The German poet Heinrich Heine believed that "wherever they burn books, they will also, in the end, burn human beings."

The writer Rebecca West asserted, "God forbid that any book should be banned. The practice is as indefensible as infanticide."

Jewish Life

Does God really matter?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Does God exist in any way as a moral ground for the non-believer? Is God like a distant volcano that they have heard about – imposing, inaccessible, somewhat brooding but capable of eruption? Or is God just a complete epistemological blank, like a leprechaun but not as charming? Or is God simply just a word, three random letters in English, four in French and German, of several lengths in Hebrew? Does the injection of some kind of a divinely based morality into a contemporary ethical conversation have any standing, or is it, ironically, reduced by cultural relativism to just another opinion in the spectrum.

JEWISH EDUCATION The Next Generation

In the opening to A Brief History of Time, Prof. Steven Hawking relates an anecdote about a lecture on astronomy given by a well-known scientist who described how "the Earth orbits around the sun and how the sun, in turn, orbits around the centre of a vast collection of stars called our galaxy. At the end of the lecture, a little old lady at the back of the room got up and said: 'What you have told us is rubbish. The world is really a flat plate supported on the back of a giant tortoise.'

"The scientist gave a superior smile before replying, 'What is the tortoise standing on?'

"'You're very clever, young man, very clever,' said the old lady. 'But it's turtles all the way down.'"

For many students today, God is the turtle theory as presented by a little old lady – quaint, charming, a tad loony, a relic of pre-scientific knowledge. Not that they would assert outright atheism or anything as strident as that. Indeed, many would profess to believing in God without that belief having much, if any, consequence in their lives in any practical way. No need to attack God when the divine can simply be absorbed, meekly assigned one of the stalls near the end of the row of the relativist flea market.

I have never been offended when people talk about religion as a matter of faith. There are Bible codes out there and "proofs of God seminars," paradoxically using the language and methodology and mindset of science to try and bolster faith. But once you do that, you're just playing on someone else's turf. Whenever I hear these endless debates over the supposed glories or horrors of religion, I always wonder why the next step after the assertion that religion lacks a solid empirical basis is that faith is mindless. I must have missed something in this segue.

One of the most famous questions ever posed about morality comes from Plato in his dialogue Euthyphro, in which Socrates asks the title character, "Is it good [pious] because the gods love it, or do the gods love it because it is good [pious]?"

Why are things good or bad, right or wrong? And how do we know?

The Platonic question, which is of great importance to me, doesn't resonate as a major issue for those I teach. As a student once told me, "Does it really matter? In the end, people just do what feels right to them, and they don't stop to think about whether their ethics are consistent, or whether God approves, unless they are, you know, religious."

You and your bashert

On Shabbat over the next couple of months, we will read from the book of Bereshit and hear in detail about the genesis of the Jewish people. It's hard to imagine what the world would have been like if Abram hadn't met Sarai and Isaac hadn't married Rebekah.

Jewish & Digital
By Mark Mietkiewicz

The story of our matriarchs and patriarchs meetings their basherts is well-known. But what about the rest of us? Translated as "fated," bashert is often used to mean the predestined soulmate. Today, a look at this intriguing concept.

According to tradition, 40 days before a child is conceived, God has already decided one's bashert, "literally, a match made in heaven." But just because a match is made in heaven "doesn't mean that your marriage will be trouble-free. Marriage, like everything worthwhile in life, requires dedication, effort and energy." [http://bit.ly/bashert1]

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin says there's no excuse for just waiting for things to happen. He quotes the statement in the Talmud that bringing two people together in marriage is as difficult as the splitting of the Red Sea (Sanhedrin 22a). "Comparing marriage to the splitting of the Red Sea is how the sages address the doubts and fears all couples face. The comparison tells the questioning, and even fearful, loving friends at the brink of a critical decision that they have to take the plunge, make the first move, be willing to work hard and to constantly move forward. Neither he nor she may sit back and wait for 'bashert.'" [http://bit.ly/bashert7]

Rabbi Micah Kelber has problems with the concept. Preoccupation over whether you are with your intended "can usher in regret or even panic – encouraging you to ignore the failings of a relationship or to celebrate, disproportionately, the present stage of your love… Meanwhile, if you're not currently in a romantic relationship, the concept of bashert also puts unnecessary pressure on you to find 'the one.'" [http://bit.ly/bashert3]

One of Emuna Braverman's students asked her, "How will I know he's my bashert, my soulmate?"

"It doesn't matter," she replied. "Make a commitment to him, put in all the hard work and effort necessary and he'll become your bashert." [http://bit.ly/bashert4]

Martin Bodek uses a different approach: arithmetic! In "How to Find Your Bashert," Bodek makes some interesting calculations to prove how there are billions of people in the world who are wrong for you. But don't despair, Mr. or Ms. Right is out there… if Bodek's math is right. [http://bit.ly/bashert5]

Tamar Caspi was once sure she had met her bashert. And then he moved away to university in another state. Ten years later, Caspi believes that she finally has found her "bashert, but not because some cosmic force propelled us toward each other. Rather, it was because of a mixture of a number of components, including timing, maturation and the willingness to compromise.

"Man, am I glad I waited and didn't settle! Too many people reach their breaking point and are just so sick of dating that they pick the best of the 'just okay,' and figure that may be as good as it gets – and maybe it is for them – instead of getting what they need from the relationship, and then moving on. It may sound daunting, and I'm sure many singletons probably feel like they're looking down a tunnel and not seeing the light at the end, but it will happen, it (almost) always does." [http://bit.ly/bashert6]

Conversion to Christianity was a 'mistake'

The door of a Bene Ephraim home decorated with Jewish symbols.

As the Bene Ephraim's spokesman, Sadok Yacobi explained it to them, their community's conversion to Christianity was "a mistake" prompted by social pressures and by famine, as Christians were giving out food at the time, Rabbi Gerald said.

While they had maintained several Jewish practices over those years, including resting on Sabbath and eating kosher food, in the 1970s they reclaimed their Jewish heritage. The Bene Ephraim had been among the Madiga sub-caste of the Untouchables, the lowest rung on the highly stratified Hindu culture, he said.

Historically they worked with leather, which made them impure by Hindu standards, "so, many say that they wanted out of the Hindu caste system that put them at the bottom."

Asked whether they might be motivated to assume a Jewish identity in the hopes of immigrating to Israel, Rabbi Gerald said, "No one saw going to Israel as a realistic possibility. They're very poor agricultural labourers, and the kind of life in modern Israel is very far from them. I did not hear a big desire to go to Israel."

Some Jewish organizations have taken their story to heart and are trying to improve their conditions. Rabbi Marvin Tokayer of Great Neck, N.Y., who served as rabbi in Tokyo for a time and became an expert on Asian Jews, has raised funds to allow the Bene Ephraim to purchase a couple of water buffalo, whose milk is sold to supplement their incomes. A Jewish group in California provided funds to allow the purchase of chickens, while Kulanu contributed $500, which the Sussmans supplemented with their own funds, to provide one family with three bicycles, a sewing machine and a candle-making machine, Gerald said.

After spending time with them, Rabbi Gerald's impression is quite positive: "I like them. There's something about them that's appealing. They're very steadfast… After the Lashkar incident, they debated whether to go low key. They decided not to, and they even felt [our] arrival justified their decision to be connected to the wider Jewish world."

Ottawa puts lid on imam

Compiled by CJN Staff

Imam Zijad Delic, executive director of the Canadian Islamic Congress, was prevented from speaking at National Defence headquarters in Ottawa on Monday because the former head of the group had made anti-Semitic statements in the past.

A CTV News report on Oct. 2 cited comments made by Mohamed Elmasry in 2004 in which he said Israelis over 18 were legitimate targets for suicide bombers. Elmasry later apologized for and retracted the remarks.

But because of those remarks, Defence Minister Peter Mackay cancelled Imam Delic's planned Oct. 4 address in honour of Islamic Heritage Month.

"These types of comments don't support Islamic Heritage, they simply divide Canadians and promulgate hate, and they have no place in [Islamic Heritage Month] celebrations. Instead, Monday's celebrations will focus on the evolution of Islam in the Canadian Forces and the positive contribution of Canada's Muslim community to our society," a ministry statement said last Friday.

Imam Delic told CTV his organization views suicide bombings as a "totally un-Islamic act."

"There is no such thing in the Qur'an that would tell Muslims to go and kill a Jew, for indeed that is against our basic concepts," he said.

Imam Delic said he believed Mackay unfairly targeted his group, which seeks "better relations between Canadian Muslims and the general Canadian population."

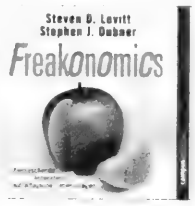
'Catholic' Jew helps kick off Ottawa drive

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Internationally famous for his best-selling books, Freakonomics: A Rogue Economist Explores the Hidden Side of Everything and the 2009 sequel Superfreakonomics, Jewish author Stephen J. Dubner spoke in Ottawa recently about one of his previous books, Choosing my Religion, about growing up Catholic.

The book, first published in 1998, was originally titled Turbulent Souls: A Catholic Son's Return to his Jewish Family, and that was the story he shared with the audience.



"It has been said that all families are strange. It has been said additionally that Jewish families are particularly strange. My Jewish family is even more strange because they were also Catholic," said Dubner, who spoke Sept. 19 at the Canadian Museum of Civilization at the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's 2011 campaign kickoff.

His parents had both been born and raised Jewish in Brooklyn, N.Y. For various reasons, at approximately the same time, each had become disillusioned with Judaism and sought comfort and meaning in Catholicism. Ironically, a Catholic priest introduced them to each other and the rest, as they say, is history.

The young couple married and moved to a small town in upstate New York, far away from their families and their past. There they raised a family of eight children in a household that revolved around their religious observances. "We observed holidays that most Catholics don't even know exist. My parents saw it as their mission to out-Catholic any Catholic," Dubner said.

The family never discussed their Jewish roots and the children knew nothing about Jews or Judaism, had no contact with their relatives or their past. "Every Sunday after mass, my father had his after-mass nosh of matzah and gefilte fish," said Dubner. "When they wanted to talk about something so that we could not understand, they spoke Yiddish. I knew my parents were odd, but I didn't know what it was about. I thought it was just because they came from Brooklyn," he said.

Only when Dubner moved to New York in his 20s did he discover that "a Jew is not someone who grows up and becomes a Catholic. New York was a strange place that was full of Jews who did not turn into Catholics," he said.

Dubner embarked on a journey to find out about his family, about Judaism and about his place in the religion. He ultimately chose to identify as a Jew, the only one in his family to do so. This decision upset his mother terribly – his father died when Dubner was only 10 – and caused a rift that was only healed shortly before her death, with the intervention of a Catholic clergyman.

The Ottawa campaign kickoff was co-chaired by Ilana and Harris Prehogan and Avalee and Ron Prehogan. The 2011 campaign chair is Steven Kerzner and women's campaign chair is Linda Kerzner.

Montreal students remember murdered teen

Emotional tribute held for Shirel Attar

By JANICE ARNOLD

Marymount Academy students gather for the dedication of a tree planted in memory of their classmate, Shirel Attar. From left are Joshua Casanova, Shakeira Bernicky, Stephanie Lopez, Kelsey Dos Santos, Ashley Ighorewo, Niroshana Thirunavukarasu and Priscilla Guerra.

MONTREAL — Shirel Attar was remembered by her fellow high school students at Marymount Academy in an emotional, but dignified, memorial that included candle-lighting, singing and poetry reading.

Many of the 200 girls and boys who gathered Sept. 22 in the school's cafeteria wept, as did the staff and other adults. All who spoke stressed how beloved Shirel quickly became during her one year at the school in 2009-2010 and that her spirit will have positive impact.

They wore blue armbands they had made with Shirel's name printed on it and decorated with a white ribbon and tiny plastic dove, as they sat solemnly watching the proceedings.

The mood was set when the school choir, dressed in black, sang Tears in Heaven, Eric Clapton's heart-rending ballad that he wrote after the accidental death of his young son.

Grade 8 student Rachelle Allen composed a poem for her late friend in which she asked "I want to know how she's doing so far away. Is she laughing and running today. I'd love just a little peak into heaven, to know how she is doing."

Another friend Bianca Saudelli, in her poem, said she thinks of Shirel as just beginning a new journey, "resting from sorrow and tears," and that "she will never pass away."

Attar, 14, died Aug. 9 at her Côte St. Luc home. Her brother Maor, 18, has been charged with her first-degree murder.

Shirel attended Grade 8 at Marymount last year, after going to Jewish People's and Peretz Schools (JPPS) and Grade 7 at Bialik High School.

Vice-principal Debra Michael represented JPPS at the memorial. She told The CJN that Shirel, whom she had known for several years and had taught, was "a very sweet, very quiet girl."

Marymount, which is under the English Montreal School Board, has about 700 students who come from a wide range of cultural backgrounds and areas of the West End, and its curriculum includes an international baccalaureate (IB) program.

Principal Craig Olenik said that the turnout, which was voluntary, is "a testament to the fact that Shirel touched so many lives in her short time" at Marymount.

"I was impressed by the number of students who came forward to express their thoughts or be involved," he said. "I am overwhelmed by the grace, maturity and caring we have seen exhibited today."

The printed program of the service featured a drawing of a giraffe by Shirel and the quote: "I am very proud and satisfied of my work, the reason why was because I took my time and I was paying a lot of attention."

Those words only underlined how brief Shirel's days on earth were.

Her mother, Anat Kirko, and older sister, Karine, were present, but they did not speak and declined any comment.

On the table at the front of the room was a burning red taper used to light three memorial candles, representing the past, present and future, said spiritual facilitator Erico Santos.

One of Shirel's closest friends, Destiny Hinckson, lit the first candle and spoke of Shirel's brief life as having been a gift that brought "many joys and special moments." She sang a solo rendition of the inspirational You Raise Me Up, made popular by Josh Groban, her clear voice cracking at times.

The second candle was lit by Tracy Mangel, co-ordinator of the IB program, and the third by Santos, who said it symbolized hope, despite this tragedy.

Grade 11 student Darragh Kilkenny-Mondoux, a representative of LOVE (Leave Out Violence), made a few remarks. The award-winning national organization that aims to steer youth away from violence was founded in 1993 by Twinkle Rudberg, whose husband was murdered by a 14-year-old boy in Montreal.

"It's disheartening, but not discouraging, when things like this happen, but we can take wisdom from this," she said.

Kilkenny-Mondoux read a verse she wrote comparing Shirel to a star in the sky that vanishes, leaving the heavens less bright. "But stars don't die," she concluded. "They may no longer be burning, but they are still there."

The assembly then moved outdoors where, in front of the school, located on Côte St. Luc Road, a tree has been planted in memory of Shirel. Many students hugged each other as the double-trunked birch was dedicated.

Students and staff who need it have been able to seek counselling with the EMSB's special trauma team.

Sapling from Anne Frank tree planted in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Much hope for a better world was planted along with a scrawny, leafless stalk not much more than a foot high in the courtyard behind Federation CJA's Cummings House last week.

The humble sapling grew from a chestnut that was the fruit of the very tree that Anne Frank wrote about from her hiding place in Amsterdam. The mighty chestnut that she could glimpse daily, her only link with nature and the outside world, gave her comfort during the family's two years of hiding from the Nazis during World War II.

That chestnut, which was about 150 years old and stood outside what is today Anne Frank House, was toppled by a storm Aug. 23. For three years, there had been an international campaign to save the rotting tree, which in its final year was being held up by a steel support.

The sapling was obtained by Montreal lawyer Michael Vineberg, president of the Canadian branch of the Anne Frank Foundation, from Anne Frank House, and donated to the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC).

Vineberg said that this will be the only sapling given to Canada. For the past five years, Anne Frank House has been germinating chestnuts from the ailing tree in order to perpetuate it through its offspring, should it die.

One hundred and fifty seed pods from the old tree have been planted in Amsterdam, and a limited number have been made available – at least 25, according to Vineberg – to other countries.

Eleven have gone to the United States for planting, including at the White House and two sites that evoke the consequences of intolerance and violence – New York's destroyed World Trade Centre and Little Rock Central High School in Arkansas, where black students were forcibly segregated in the 1950s.

The tougher part was getting permission to bring the sapling into this country, because of stringent regulations concerning the importation of plants, he said. Clearance was finally granted after four or five months of communication with Agriculture Canada, he said.

But Montreal is luckier than some U.S. states, where the saplings were ordered kept in quarantine for two years.

The sapling was planted in a ceremony on a rainy Sept. 27 evening by Vineberg, Federation CJA president Jack Hasen, whose parents were Holocaust survivors, and Michael Polak, the honorary Dutch consul in Montreal, whose Dutch-born parents are also survivors. His mother, Celien, went to the same school and was in the same grade as Frank, but did not know her personally.

Recalling his most recent of many visits to the Anne Frank House in July, Polak said, "I had never seen lineups like this before, and most of them were young people. They spoke languages from all over the world, including Arabic and German. This means the message of Anne Frank is still very much alive."

Among the numerous survivors and their children present for the planting was someone who did know Frank, 84-year-old Ilse Zilversmit. Her mother and Frank's mother had an uncle and aunt in common, but were not directly related. The families went to the same synagogue, and Zilversmit was friends with Anne's older sister, Margot, while her younger sister was closer to Anne, who would be 81 today.

"Anne was a nice girl, but a little, I wouldn't say wild, let's say energetic," Zilversmit recalled in an interview, "while her older sister was very serious."

The Zilversmits were deported to the Westerbork camp in Holland in 1943, and later to Bergen-Belsen, where one day they came in contact with the Frank sisters again.

"We spoke to them, but couldn't see them because there were two rows of barbed wire with straw in between. Anne asked if there was anyone from Holland, and then when we answered, if we had any food. We found some bread and threw it over, but someone else grabbed it first. Those were the last words we had with them."

Margot, like Anne, would also die in Bergen-Belsen in March 1945.

The little tree-to-be is near the Westbury Avenue gate of the courtyard, known as the Peace Garden, and beside it is a plaque reading: "In memory of Anne Frank killed in the Holocaust. This sapling is from the chestnut tree which so inspired her."

Vineberg said it's hoped that the tree, as it grows – and it can easily reach 25 metres or more – will likewise inspire generations to seek to live in mutual respect with others.

The MHMC, which has a large museum, had 13,000 visitors this past year, including some 6,000 students.

Vineberg's personal wish is that he will be able to come back in 10 years and see young people sitting under its branches, perhaps reading from The Diary of Anne Frank and learning from its timeless lesson that we must continue to believe in the essential goodness of people.

Anne Frank, who died at 15, became a symbol of the millions who perished in the Holocaust, particularly the 1.5 million Jewish children. Her book was translated into more than 70 languages and has sold 36 million copies around the world, making it the best-read piece of writing related to World War II of all time, Vineberg noted.

Montreal is a fitting site for the sole Canadian home of the Frank tree descendant, Vineberg said, because it is "a cosmopolitan and tolerant city" and became home to 9,000 survivors after the war, and many other victims of genocides since then in Cambodia, Bosnia and Rwanda.

MHMC president Susyn Borer said, that Frank, though she died so young and so tragically, is a survivor. "Jewish tradition holds that a person can suffer two deaths. The first is physical death, which we all go through, but we also die a second time when we are forgotten. Anne Frank, thankfully, will never experience that."

Neighbourhood hit by anti-Semitic graffiti

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — A swastika was found last month on a sign on the site of a new Chabad-Lubavitch centre being built in the River Heights neighbourhood of Winnipeg's south end, where many of the city's Jews live.

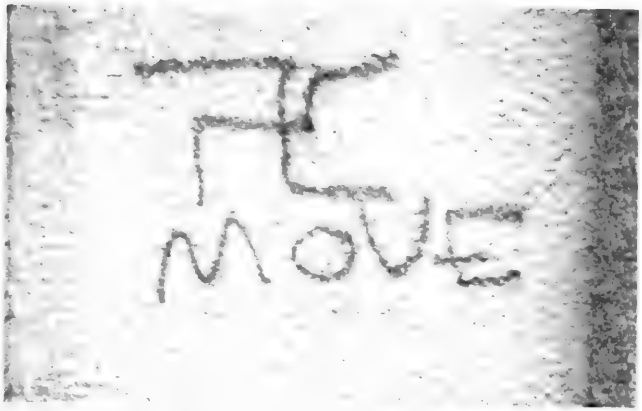
The Sept. 11 discovery was the latest in a series of incidents involving anti-Semitic graffiti in the area since this past spring.

Michael Kowalson, a resident of River Heights, reported the swastika to Winnipeg police. He said that he told them "this was the third or fourth incident of a swastika in River Heights that I've heard about this year and that... the way to address this situation is through citizens reporting to police suspicious persons or activity and through increased police patrols in the community."

Last May, a swastika was found on a bus shelter on a major thoroughfare near the new Chabad-Lubavitch centre.

Another Jewish resident of River Heights also reported finding a swastika with the words "Heil Hitler" scrawled on her neighbour's garage this past June.

The woman's non-Jewish neighbours down the street, David and Christine Lind, had 32 swastikas drawn on their garage door the same week.



Last May, a swastika and the word "move" were spray painted on 792 Campbell St. in Winnipeg's River Heights neighbourhood. [Rhonda Spivak photo]

"In one of the boxes on the garage the words 'Heil Hitler' had been written," David Lind told The CJN. "Not all of the swastikas were drawn properly, but they all looked to be written by the same hand. In another box, the words 'white power' were written."

Lind said that whoever drew the symbols was "tall enough to reach the top part of my garage door, so it couldn't have been an eight- or nine-year-old. I figure it had to be someone who was at least five feet tall."

Lind also said the attack was particularly bad, because his house faces Fleet Avenue, "and on Saturdays, there are a lot of Jewish people who walk by, going to and from [Herzlia-Adas Yeshurun] Synagogue [located a few blocks away on Fleet], and because we are on a corner, they could see this from Fleet."

The latest swastika on the Chabad-Lubavitch property appears to have been drawn in permanent black marker, similar to others found in earlier incidents.

Last May, Rob Vittera, whose son attends the Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon School, came forward on his own initiative to paint over some very large swastikas that were spray-painted on the home of Kay Robertson and Earl Varlow at 792 Campbell St., also in River Heights.

A large swastika with the word "move" was spray-painted on an area of the house that faces the kitchen window of the couple's Jewish neighbour, Marsha Singer.

Although Robertson and Varlow, who are not Jewish, were aware of the swastikas, they didn't report them to police until Vittera convinced them to do so.

Alan Yusim, executive director of B'nai Brith Canada's midwest region, said he's asked the Winnipeg Police hate crimes unit to investigate whether the recent incidents in River Heights are related and possibly the work of the same culprit or culprits.

Const. Natalie Aiken of the Winnipeg Police Service told The CJN that "these instances have been flagged and sent to our hate crimes co-ordinator. The investigations are ongoing. If there is further information that comes to light suggesting [the instances] are linked, we will pursue this."

Galloway challenges Kenney to debate

Compiled by CJN Staff

A colourful and controversial former British MP who had been barred from entering Canada last year because of his connection with Hamas challenged Citizenship and Immigration Minister Jason Kenney to go five rounds with him in a debate.

Sporting red and white Roots mitts, George Galloway told an enthusiastic audience at Trinity-St. Paul's United Church on the weekend that Kenney ought to resign. He said he planned to sue the Canadian government for slandering him.

Galloway's Canadian visit last weekend came a year and a half after Kenney's office said Galloway should not be admitted because he had raised funds for the terrorist organization, Hamas.

Galloway challenged that finding in court and last week Federal Court Judge Richard Mosley accepted Galloway's contention that federal authorities were motivated by political considerations in barring him.

Although Mosley ruled there was no basis for a judicial review, as Galloway did not appear at a border crossing to test whether a border officer would actually turn him away, he said that if Galloway had done so and been barred, he would have overturned that decision. Mosley stated there was a reasonable apprehension of bias, based on statements from Kenney's office suggesting Galloway should be prevented from entering Canada.

Galloway was to appear on a three-city speaking tour, but a spokesperson for Kenney stated he was unwelcome in Canada after having provided Hamas with $44,000 in cash.

In a 60-page judgment, Mosley addressed the question of whether that contribution, which Galloway claimed was for humanitarian purposes, amounted to supporting a terrorist organization.

Mosley said that to be barred from entry, the Crown would have had to show Galloway's purpose was "to enhance the ability of a terrorist group to facilitate or carry out a terrorist activity… Absent such a purpose, the mere assertion that material support was provided to such an organization is not sufficient."

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said as long as Galloway does not violate Canadian law, "he should be allowed to come into the country, no matter how offensive his views may be."

In his speaking engagement, Galloway tore into the government of Israel, saying Jerusalem was being "ethnically cleansed." Earlier, upon arriving at Pearson International Airport, he alleged barring him had put his life in danger.

Galloway said he planned to return in November for a 10-city speaking tour.

על השטר מפי השטרר

הסרידה דרך פרסמה ב"שלום מדרונטי" כתבה מרתקת עם יענ ורד, אל"מ במלואים, שסיים תקופת שליחות ארוכה בקנדה לניהם כספים למטרות ישראליות. הוא היה בקנדה מספר פעמים וייצג בד השאר את הקרן הקיימת ואת ראשות העתירות הלאומית. לא כל יום ניתן לשמוע דברים כנים על גיוס כספים מפי המגויסים עצמם. יש לאל"מ ורד, שבילה בקנדה שנות שטר רבות, ביקורת נוקבת על כך שהקהילות בקנדה מציגות את ישראל לעתים לרוב מהזוית המסכנה כדי לעורר רחמים ולגיים תרומות. ועל כך שבטיפי של דבר חלק ניכר מהכסף שמגויים לשדרות ולשאר מרקדי מבוקה בישראל נשאר בקנדה למטרות הקהילה כאן. "יש הנזמה בשימוש בעצבניות, בהתבטיעות, במלחמות, בילדים ובקשישים רעבים ללחם.....כי מצד שני ישראל מתגאה שהיא בין המדינות המתקדמות והמתעשות בשולם....אז למה מנשיכים לשנדר?"

בעניין הצגת המסכנה- ראיתי לא אחת ולא שתיים בתי ילדים ישראלים ששולחים מישראל בקשות תמיכה תוך הצגת הזוית המסכנה, כך שעניין המסכנות אינה מאפיינת של יהודי הגולה, אלא גם של יהודי מדינת ישראל. "רחמו יהודים ורחמו" לא נולדה בקנדה.

אמירות הפז של הרב עובדיה

הרב עובדיה הוא מבהיגם הרוחני של מאות אלפי ישראלים, ודברי הדרשה בשעורי התורה השבועיים שלו הם בר לרגליהם. הוא גם הפוסק העליון על כל ההלכותיה של מפלגת ש"ס, כמו גם על ההלכותיו של הרב הראשי הספרדי. אפשר לומר בביטחה שאין עוד ישראלי שיש לו השפעה כל כך מאסיבית.

למני מספר שבועות התייחס הרב בדברי הדרשה שלו לכיכוי ההפגד עם הפלשתינאים ואמר "שימותו כל הפלשתינאים וילכו לעזאזל". הדברים זכו לכיסוי עיתונאי בינלאומי, לגינוי של רוב ארגוית העולם ולביקורת אמריקאית קשה. היחיד שהתנגד בפלחות היה דווקא מבהיר פלשתינאי שאמר לסי אן אן: "אפילו הישראלים יודעים שהוא אהבל וחרשבים שהוא בדיחה".

אפשר להתבדח על זה כאירוע מזרח תיכוני נישיס סיקאסבי ואפשר להתייחס לעניין כלאחר יד. אבל אז-אל לנו לצדוה כמו תרגלות בדרך לשחשה כשמנהיג איראן קורא להשמיד את מדינת ישראל.

דבריו של הרב שבדיה הם עבירה על התוק. נכון שהוא כבר בן תשעים ואולי היכולת שלו לשלוט על סוגיו נחלשה- אבל לשם כך קיימים בתי אבות, שם הוא יכול לדבר כאוות נפשו והמשפלה הפוליטית שלו תחיך.

"The Town"

בן אפלאק מחשב עד לאחרונה ליפיוף הוליוודי שמפיע בסרטי צ'יקס פוליקס ושאר הזמנים רומנטיים. על כן היה מפתיע מאוד לראות אותו מביים ומשחק כפושע בסרטי שמנסה לשבור ולהשתחרר ממעגל הפשע. הסרט מרתק מאוד, גדוש בשוקנים משליים וונריים משכנע, שגם הוא נבתב על ידי אפלאק. אין מה לומר- שידידנו מבודך.

Jewish Business Network expands across Canada

By RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

Matan Hazanov wants to inspire business students to get involved in the Jewish community.

One casino night at a time.

Hazanov, along with Adam Renkosinki and Jordan Bizouati, noticed that their Jewish classmates in York University's Schulich School of Business weren't engaging with the school's Jewish community.

This is partly why, last year, the three students started the Jewish Business Network (JBN), a social organization that helps Jewish business students to network, socialize, find internships and connect to the wider Jewish community.

"Over 75 per cent of Jewish students in business are not involved in anything Jewish," said Hazanov, JBN's national director and a fourth-year student at Schulich.

"We realized it's not because they don't want to be involved, it's because there's a lack of incentive to be involved."

At JBN, students are offered networking oppaortunities with successful Jewish businesspeople, social nights, Shabbat dinners and internship options.

"Business students want to succeed. One of the main ways they'll do that is by getting internships and meeting successful businesspeople," Hazanov said.

In addition to creating business opportunities, JBN also strives to infuse its events with Jewish values.

"Every single one of our events has Jewish educational content. Our education is largely focused on business ethics, happiness, relieving stress... A lot of these concepts can be derived from Judaism."

And the organization has been well received. While the group started out with eight student leaders last year, they now have 40 nationally.

The organization recently launched chapters at schools including Ryerson University, The University of Western Ontario, Queen's University, McMaster University, the University of Toronto and the University of Winnipeg.

"All we're trying to do is inspire Jewish students to take responsibility for the Jewish community," Hazanov said.

But running JBN isn't an easy task. Or a cheap one. Hazanov and his peers have been fundraising and approaching private donors in the community to support the group's events, which included a trip to New York last year.

"Every single thing costs money. I approach private donors, anyone that wants to get more involved in the Jewish community and wants to develop Jewish leaders," he said.

Max Kalles, the founder of AutoShopit.com, sees the value in JBN.

JBN members on a group trip to New York last year

"I decided to get involved. One of the main reasons was, when I was in university, there was no JBN. When I graduated, I found that I really didn't know what to do," said Kalles, who graduated from Carleton University in 2004 with a degree in international business.

"When I heard that there was an organization whose goal was giving Jewish business students an edge, I thought it was a great idea."

Kalles spoke to members of JBN about starting a business and the importance of networking.

"I tried to instil in them the value of joining a network. I found, when running our business, the [social] network was what allowed us to be successful," he said.

Tyler Gould, a third-year business student majoring in accounting at Ryerson University, understands the importance of networking.

"The job market, especially now, is not so good. Business is who you know, not what you know," said Gould, president of JBN's chapter at Ryerson, where the organization is in the process of becoming an official campus group.

Gould sees JBN as a way to spread Jewish values in business.

"We thought this would be a good way to get Jews who were uninvolved to actually care and come to events," he said.

"We wanted to show people that Jewish values [like don't lie, cheat and steal] are relevant in business."

Temptations in Jerusalem

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Dafna Baruch is the chef and owner of two successful Jerusalem restaurants. The first, Pituim (which means temptations), is in the German Colony just off Emek Refaim. Her second restaurant is in the Mamilla Mall, just above the new Gap store.

This 34-year-old mother of three exudes a lot of self-confidence, creativity and talent.

Baruch was born in Jerusalem, and her parents were born in Jerusalem, although her father's parents came from Turkey. Her mother's parents were many-generation Jerusalemites on one side, and her grandmother was from Lebanon.

"All my life until the age of 15, I never stepped into the kitchen!" she exclaims.

When she took a cooking course at school, she says, "for the first time, I saw I had a talent for this," but her mother didn't want her in the kitchen.

In the army, she taught martial arts because she had a black belt in taekwondo and then did some post-army travelling in the United States.

When she returned to Israel in 1994, she knew she wanted to do two things – cook and learn archeology. Since the timing was wrong to start university, she started cooking for a French restaurant and enrolled in the culinary course at Hadassah College.

She married Meir, a personal trainer, and by the time she had completed her Hadassah course, she was sous-chef at the French restaurant.

Baruch decided that "a good chef has to know to cook and to bake, and this was what I wanted to do," and she went to London for six months to study pastry at Le Cordon Bleu.

When she returned, a friend of her husband's told her his dream was to open a restaurant, but only with her. So at the age of 23 and pregnant, she opened a very small place in the German Colony, called Pituim, temptations.

Why this name?

"When I thought of a name, I thought it was exactly what I do. Everyone will go and say, 'You can tempt me today,'" since it was more bakery than restaurant.

After about three years, Baruch decided to move to a bigger space, at the side of German Colony, "so people who come would come to me, not the street," she said. She chose a place "with history," in a building 70 or 80 years old that she remembered from when she was six years old.

Inside are wooden chairs and tables with red checkered tablecloths in an area that seats about 21; in the garden with wicker chairs, there are seats for about 40.

Baruch later opened a second restaurant in Mamilla Mall. "I really like this place. It's one of the most beautiful malls in Israel. Also, my father was born in Mamilla; it was the border then. When he was two years old or younger, he went across the border and the Jordanian soldiers were pointing their guns at him and my grandmother was trying to get him back with candy."

Restaurant showcases 25 desserts

Pituim is a kosher mehadrin dairy restaurant where one can have breakfast, lunch or dinner. Breakfast can be for one or two, and includes a long list of sandwiches that come with a salad. Specialties include a portobello burger, a round and crispy polenta with mushroom and pesto and white wine, lasagna, and fish such as salmon with red wine and almonds. There are also soups, salads, pastas and quiches. Pituim salad has lettuce, avocado, red grapefruit, pine nuts and fried Bulgarian cheese in a mustard vinaigrette. There is a fixed menu, but some changes are made every season. No one should leave the table without a temptation such as mousse cakes, tarts and pies or a special temptation – hot chocolate souffle.

The showcase features 25 different desserts, which Baruch makes herself, including sweets to buy and take home, in boxes with the restaurant's rolling pin logo.

Today, Baruch has three children, ages nine, five and two, and she is not done with Pituim.

"Now I have a project to open Temptations as a kosher bakery in Los Angeles. It's very interesting," she says. "I think it can work wonderfully."

Pituim is located at Rachel Imenu 5. Phone 02 566 2899

CHOCOLATE MOUSSE WITH NOUGAT AND HAZELNUTS

Base
1/4 cup crushed cornflakes
3 1/2 oz. milk chocolate
2 tbsp. nougat (Hazelnut paste)

Filling
10 1/2 oz. dark chocolate
2 tbsp. nougat
13 oz. 42 per cent heavy cream
2 separated eggs plus 2 egg yolks
1/4 cup sugar

cocoa powder
chopped hazelnuts
hazelnuts dipped in chocolate

Preheat oven to 325. Place parchment paper in the bottom of a soufflé pan.

Melt milk chocolate in a double boiler. Blend together with nougat and mix with corn flakes. Pat mixture on the paper and bake in preheated 325-degree oven for 2-3 minutes. Let cool.

Melt dark chocolate with nougat in a double boiler.

Whip two egg whites, adding sugar as they get stiff. Set aside.

Whip heavy cream until it starts to get thick then add egg yolks, one at a time. Add chocolate with nougat. Fold in egg whites. Spoon mousse onto base. Freeze at least four hours.

Garnish with cocoa powder or chopped hazelnuts or hazelnuts dipped in chocolate.

Psychiatric centre accepts all as working 'members'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — It has been up and running for only a few months in a renovated building off a parking lot at 6909 Decarie Blvd.

But the Donald Berman UP House clubhouse, a new non-denominational centre for adults with psychiatric disorders, is already forging partnerships with Jewish and other community agencies and can claim a number of Jewish figures among its founding supporters and benefactors.

The UP House, which opens officially Oct. 8, uses a model of a "community of people working together toward the common goal of recovery." The first such clubhouse in Quebec and one of more than 300 all over the world including in Israel, it's affiliated with the International Centre of Clubhouse Development (ICCD), established in 1948 in New York City as Fountain House.

UP House executive director Ruth McLellan said that "working together" is what makes this psychosocial rehabilitative model unique. Individuals with psychiatric problems – which could include bipolar disorder, schizophrenia or depression – join voluntarily as "members," with work a key element in building a positive sense of autonomy and self-empowerment.

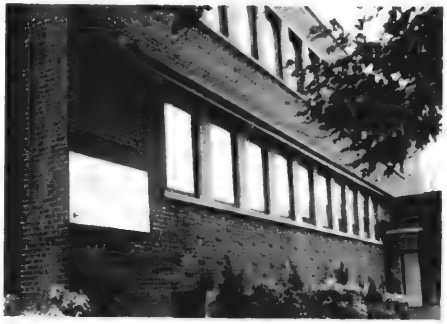
"They have responsibilities, and everything is work-activated," McLellan said. "Staff people and members work side by side. There are no therapy sessions."

The "UP" in UP House is an acronym for "Urban Pardes," a charitable organization established locally to fund the non-profit clubhouse and other charitable projects. "Pardes" is the Hebrew word for "orchard" or "garden," and in this case, also points to the level of Jewish input in UP House, even though it is non-sectarian. Significant participants and benefactors include the Donald Berman and other private foundations, as well as a number of Jewish individuals who prefer to remain unidentified.

McLellan pointed to a sign on the wall describing UP House's four main underpinnings: members have "a right to a place to come; a right to meaningful relationships; a right to work; and a place to return."

"This is what we're all about," she said. "We focus on the 'well' part of the person, to help them get in touch with who they are, with their hopes and dreams."

Already, McLellan said, local Jewish agencies such as Federation CJA's Agence Ometz, as well as the psychiatry department at the Jewish General Hospital, and non-Jewish agencies such as AMI-Québec and the Forward House, have welcomed the presence of an ICCD clubhouse in Quebec.



The new Donald Berman UP House, a clubhouse for people with psychiatric disorders.

"Someone at AMI-Québec said to me: 'Where were you 40 years ago?'" McLellan said.

A tour of the facility with McLellan showed how work in a congenial, collegial environment is what the place is all about and how effective it seems. Members can chose from any of three work units: administrative tasks such as filing and working on a newsletter; communications tasks such as reception and computer work; or kitchen-related work including food purchasing, cleanup, pricing and gardening.

There is a modern, stainless steel kitchen, a library and a bank of computers that members may use. Members may come and go as they please, McLellan pointed out, but they are expected to fulfil their obligations during the 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. day, which includes joint member-staff meetings. The morning and afternoon work periods are broken up by a healthful lunch prepared by members. Although there is a nominal $2 charge for lunch, UP House membership is free.

The clubhouse also has education and employment programs to give members the skills they need to achieve career goals.

"Everything they do here can be put onto a CV," McLellan said.

Launched unofficially in July, the UP House already has more than 90 members. There are about 20 other ICCD clubhouses across Canada, with many, if not most, also receiving financial support from the provinces in which they are located. While UP House is registered in Quebec as a charitable, non-profit institution, it is awaiting its full accreditation from ICCD.

UP House is also in the process of establishing its own website – it will be, www.uphouse.org – and its own Facebook page.

Meanwhile, for more information on UP House and clubhouse model, call 514-764-5599, e-mail McLellan at, ruth.mclellan@clubhouse.org, or go to the ICCD website at www.iccd.org.

It never hurts to be civil

Question: I am currently separated and my ex and I have joint custody. If she decided to move out of the city or the country, can she do that?

Answer: She would have to have your written approval or obtain a court order. Without your consent this would be very difficult, although it would be somewhat easier if she had sole custody of your child, according to the Ontario Court of Appeal. In reality, the trial division courts make decisions on the child's "best interests" on a case-by-case basis, even when the parent leaving has sole custody. However, if a parent with sole custody loses on the trial level, that parent may consider appealing to the Ontario Court of Appeal because sole custodial parents do very well up there on this issue.

Question: I have a one year old child with someone that I no longer have a relationship with — not even a civil relationship. All our communication is done via email. He pays his child support on time, but I want something "legal" in writing from him. Do I have to go to court?

Answer: You can either obtain a court order and alienate the guy or you can send him a friendly email – something like "Dear dad of my child who I don't have a civil relationship with any more. I think it's a good idea for both of us to sign a child support agreement to protect both of us. I attach a draft agreement my lawyer prepared. What do you think?" It never hurts to be civil. It doesn't necessarily lead to dancing.

Question: Can two brothers marry as a gay couple or two sisters marry as a lesbian couple in Ontario, then claim tax benefits?

Answer: Yes. The Marriage Act Regulations (Ontario and the Marriage (Prohibited Degrees) Act (Canada)) bar the lawful solemnization of marriage between a brother and sister, by whole or half blood or by court order of adoption. But these statues are silent about marriages between two sisters and/or between two brothers. Further, I cannot find anything in the Income Tax Act or its regulations. Even if there was such a provision it would likely be deemed unconstitutional.

Foster child speaks out about positive experiences

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Alex Smilansky, 23, was six years old, he raided mall restrooms with his older sister to obtain toilet paper.

"At that young age, it seemed normal for me to go hungry, and to wear several pairs of pants so I wouldn't feel my parents' [blows]," he said, speaking at the annual general meeting of Jewish Family & Child, held Sept. 21.

Now, the young man has a degree in kinesiology and health sciences from York University and is pursuing a master's degree in biomechanics.

Born in Molodova, Smilansky, who has two sisters, lived in Israel before moving here with his parents, "and it was then that the alcohol and abuse happened."

The siblings went into foster care, he said, after his sister ran away from home and told the police she was afraid to go back. "JF&CS was contacted, and I was brought to a foster home, where I lived in luxury. I had never seen such a life. I had three meals a day, and lots of toilet paper."

The siblings had visits with their parents for a number of years, he said, but their behaviour spiralled downward and the visits stopped. "Today, my father has disappeared, and I don't see my biological mother."

He was reunited with his older sister in a second foster home, he said, and was also set up with a big brother, who he still sees on a weekly basis.

Eventually, he said, his sisters were together in one foster home, and he was anxious to join them. "I would visit them, and play with their son. They invited me to live there when I was in Grade 4, and that is where I stayed until I started university. They are my real family. It is amazing to me that we had no parents, and [this family] stepped up."

Smilansky said that since he was seven, when he was taken into care by JF&CS, "the agency has provided tremendous support. I can't thank them enough for providing me with such positive experiences."

Howard Hurwitz, director of children's services at JF&CS, said that as one of the four children's aid societies in Toronto, it ensures that children are protected, and it provides support for families that can't provide a safe environment for their children.

"Alex's story is unique and inspiring. It is about strong connections to a community, and in particular to one family. It is also a story about working through challenges, and achieving success."

Also at the meeting, Ruth Ladovsky and Ahava Spillman were welcomed to the agency's board of directors, and Fay Geitzhals and Sandy Leibovitz were recognized for 25 years of service to the agency.

Teens get environmental lessons

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — High school students are being encouraged to become involved with protecting the environment, and possibly helping to take part in the oil spill cleanup on the Gulf Coast this fall.

The Jewish Eco-Leadership Training Program for grades 9 and 10 Jewish students is being launched by Teva Quebec – The Jewish Coalition for the Environment, spearheaded by Rabbi Schachar Orenstein of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, and the Mona Elaine Adilman Endowment, in collaboration with Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

Teva describes itself as a grassroots Jewish environmental education and advocacy group, founded a couple of years ago.

One of its major annual projects is taking part in a cleanup of the shoreline along the Lachine Canal. This year, prompted by the BP oil spill, the Adilman Endowment will sponsor this educational program for young Jewish people instead.

The inaugural six sessions of the Jewish eco-leadership program will focus on water resources within the context of what Judaism has to say about the environment.

Former lawyer turns to children's book

By Rita Poliakov
Staff Reporter

Leanne Milech never really wanted to be a lawyer. But it seemed like a good idea at the time.

"I was always writing... Anyone that knew me would never be like, 'Leanne's going to become a lawyer,' said Milech, 29.

But after finishing her degree in film theory and religious studies at Queen's University, law seemed like the rational choice.

"While I was still in my fourth year at Queen's, I thought I wanted to be a film professor. I applied to Tisch [School of the Arts] in New York, but I didn't have the money," she said.

"I ended up with a year off, and I was totally discombobulated. Like anyone that freaks out, I was like, 'I'm going to take my LSATs'... It was totally out of fear."

From Day 1, Milech, who spent her time at Queen's taking as many writing courses as she could, knew law school wasn't for her. But it was sensible and stable.

"I hated it. I cried. I knew it was wrong for me. I had crazy anxiety, but everyone said, 'Maybe it'll get better.' I ended up sticking it out and doing well," she said of her time at the University of Western Ontario, where she finished law school.

"I was in a whole bunch of debt. I needed a job on Bay Street and I ended up getting one, but it never felt right."

Milech began working at Heenan Blaikie, a Canadian law firm, as a first-year general corporate lawyer.

"That was when the economy was tanking. It was great they wanted me, and frankly, I needed the money because of my debt load, so I just braced myself and said, 'I'm going to try it.'

"I woke up every day feeling like I'm sitting down and doing the wrong thing with my time."

And then, seemingly out of nowhere, the right thing came along.

Alicia Belvedere, left, and Leanne Milech are the creators of Picture It Picture Books, whose publications allow kids to draw their own illustrations.

About a year ago, Alicia Belvedere, 29, a friend of Milech's and an elementary school teacher, asked Milech to write a story she could read to her Grade 4 class.

Belvedere liked the story so much, she wanted to publish it, but Milech disagreed.

"I was like, no, I know how hard it is to get a book published. But she was like, 'Why don't we do it ourselves.'"

As they talked about the idea, Milech started worrying about illustrations.

"[Belvedere] said, 'What if no one illustrates it? What if we made kids' books that kids illustrate themselves,'" Milech said.

"I started researching it, and no one had ever done it before."

Milech liked the idea, so as a side project, she started working on another story with Belvedere, called Pippa's Planet-Saving Tears, about water conservation. The friends published 100 copies of their book through Create Space, an online publishing company.

"You upload a Word file, they print and bind it and send it to you. It ended up being $3 a book, and it was a really good way to start."

Last September, while still working at the law firm, Milech went with Belvedere to their first crafts fair, where they sold seven copies of their book.

"And we were so excited. We couldn't believe it," Milech said.

The two continued to go to various fairs, and in January, Milech decided to take a leap.

"I realized I didn't want to do my job anymore, so I quit. It was incredibly scary. Even though I knew it was the right thing, it was like I was leaving my safety net," she said.

"I was so unhappy because I was suppressing a whole side of myself. I had no time to be creative and be myself, and that won out. It sounds so dramatic, but I felt like I was chipping away at my soul everyday."

Milech found a few part-time jobs and started concentrating on Picture It Picture Books, a company that she started with Belvedere.

After the Pippa book, which they eventually discontinued, the friends created interactive books like Imagining Me, where kids can draw their futures, My Alphabet and One, Deux, Three, a bilingual counting book.

Other books include Goodnight Dreams, about a girl who's never had a dream, and The Moon Story, about a clumsy boy who travels to the moon because he's afraid to do any activities on Earth.

The books were eventually purchased by Mastermind and Indigo and should hit stores soon.

"It's just to get [kids] to be creative again. We find that so many of the activities kids do are passive – like watching TV. We're trying to inspire imagination."

Milech, whose mother was a paranoid schizophrenic, has always turned to the arts as an escape.

"Since I was a baby, she would get sick two times a year with psychotic episodes. She was always on medication and hospitalized. She passed away a few years ago," Milech said.

"I think that's part of why I was so drawn to the arts and I spent so much time reading and watching movies. It was something I used as an escape from things that were going on at home.

"If I'd had books like these when I was growing up, I would have loved them."

Ahmadinejad's visit to Lebanon concerns Israel

By AVI ISSACHAROFF, BARAK RAVID and AMOS HAREL

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Israel has stepped up preparations for the visit of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Lebanon this week, during which he was scheduled to visit the country's border area with Israel.

Through UN, U.S. and French mediators, Israel urged the Lebanese government to prevent Ahmadinejad from visiting the border and engaging in what Jerusalem described as "provocation."

The Iranian leader was to visit Lebanon on Wednesday and Thursday, and was slated to visit the southern Lebanese villages of Bint Jbeil and Maroun al-Ras, each within a few kilometres of Israeli soil. The London-based newspaper Al-Quds Al-Arabi has reported that Ahmadinejad is interested in reaching the border fence to hurl stones at Israeli soldiers on the other side.

A top-ranking Israeli official said the Foreign Ministry and security services conducted security evaluations of Ahmadinejad's visit, and that Israel was engaged in military, diplomatic and public relations preparations in the days preceding it.

Last week, Israel sent messages to Lebanese Prime Minister Saad Hariri and President Michel Suleiman through UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon and the U.S. and French governments. Two weeks ago, National Security Council head Uzi Arad met in Paris with his French counterpart, Jean-David Levitte, and asked him to transfer messages to the Lebanese government stating that Jerusalem views Ahmadinejad's visit close to Israel's border as a provocative measure that could undermine regional stability and should therefore be cancelled. A similar message was delivered to U.S. officials.

Last week, Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman raised the issue in his meeting with Ban at UN headquarters in New York. Lieberman said his government is "extremely worried" about the Iranian president's visit.

Sources in Jerusalem added that even before Israel asked Lebanon to reconsider Ahmadinejad's stop in the country's south, senior U.S. and French officials had already done the same independently. American officials reportedly did so immediately following the Iranian president's speech at the UN General Assembly last month blaming the U.S. government for the Sept. 11 attacks.

"They told the Lebanese that it wouldn't be wise to facilitate Ahmadinejad's visit to the border," a high-ranking Israeli official said on condition of anonymity due to the subject's sensitive nature.

The Lebanese government has yet to respond affirmatively to the requests. The country's media, however, reported recently that while Suleiman did not oppose Ahmadinejad's arrival per se, he looked into whether the visit conformed with diplomatic protocol, undermined Lebanon's security or influenced the country's relations with "other countries" – presumably Israel.

Recent months have seen heightened tensions along the Israel-Lebanon border. In early August, a battalion commander in the Israel Defence Forces reserves, Dov Harari, was killed by an unidentified sniper near Kibbutz Manara.

Defence officials say Hezbollah believes it has an "open account" with Israel over the 2008 assassination of Imad Mughniyeh, one of its top commanders, a strike the militant group attributes to Israel. Hezbollah, they said, is planning a series of terrorist attacks in revenge for Mughniyeh's death.

Meanwhile, Syrian President Bashar Assad arrived in Tehran yesterday for a one-day visit. Iranian news agencies reported that Assad was welcomed by Ahmadinejad in an official state ceremony and met later with Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. Ahmadinejad presented Assad with an award for Syria's support of Hamas and Hezbollah, and Syrian media reported that the two leaders issued a joint statement indicating that Israel's actions – "Judaizing" Jerusalem, settlement building and the blockade on Gaza – prove it is not interested in peace.

Assad said the current attempts to revive Israeli-Palestinian dialogue have yielded no results, and represent little more than an attempt by U.S. President Barack Obama to accumulate political capital.

Israel extends construction freeze for 60 days

"No letter was sent to the prime minister. We are not going to comment on sensitive diplomatic matters," said Benjamin Chang, deputy spokesperson for the White House National Security Council.

It is not clear, however, whether Obama could have made the offer via a means other than a letter.

Most of the American favours that Obama's letter was said to contain are critical to Israel's strategic security needs that Netanyahu has been seeking for years.

Other commitments that Obama reportedly offered Netanyahu include an agreement not to ask for any further building freeze extensions, an agreement to veto any anti-Israel UN Security Council resolution in the next year and an agreement that the future fate of the settlements will be dealt with only as part of a final-status agreement with the Palestinians.

Obama's letter was also said to include a series of guarantees to prevent the smuggling of weapons and missiles into a Palestinian state, a lengthy period of interim security arrangements in the Jordan Valley and a comprehensive regional defence pact for protection from Iran to follow the establishment of the Palestinian state.

The U.S. president also reportedly vowed to upgrade Israel's security capabilities and increase the $3-billion security aid package that Israel receives annually. The letter included commitments to advanced weapons and early-warning systems, including satellites.

Mideast peace talks at impasse: Abbas

By AVI ISSACHAROFF AND BARAK RAVID

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Sunday that he was holding Israel responsible for the impasse in direct negotiations, but vowed to continue to search for solutions that could yield to progress in the recently renewed peace process.

Speaking to reporters after his meeting with Jordanian King Abdullah II, Abbas said "there is an impasse, because we cannot carry on with the negotiations, and we have to follow up this impasse with the Arab side."

"Of course, we are not going to sever ties with the Americans, and we will continue to have contacts with them to search for solutions, but the settlement building should stop and then we will return to the negotiating table," Abbas said.

The PA leader's comments came a day after the Palestinian Liberation Organization announced it would halt direct talks with Israel as long as settlement construction continues. The decision was announced by the general secretary of the PLO, Yasser Abed Rabbo.

Mahmoud Abbas

Abdullah also met Sunday with U.S. envoy George Mitchell, who was shuttling between Jordan and Cairo last weekend in an effort to salvage the peace negotiations.

A statement from the royal court said Mitchell briefed the monarch on his efforts to ensure the talks continue following the expiry of Israel's construction moratorium.

Abdullah meanwhile underlined the "pivotal U.S. role in peace efforts and in finding the suitable environment for continuing the peace negotiations and the achievement of progress towards resolving the Palestinian-Israeli conflict on the basis of the two-state vision," according to the statement.

Abdullah expressed backing for the Palestinian stance and warned that "more tension and war" would be a consequence of failure to find peace in the Middle East.

In Cairo earlier on Sunday, Mitchell said both Israel and the Palestinians wanted to continue direct peace negotiations, despite an ongoing dispute over Israel's refusal to renew its moratorium on construction in West Bank settlements.

"Both the governments of Israel and the Palestinian Authority have asked us to continue these discussions in an effort to establish the conditions under which they can continue direct negotiations," Mitchell wrote in a statement posted on the U.S. Embassy in Cairo's website. "They do not want to stop the talks."

Hamas, meanwhile, welcomed the PLO decision to suspend peace talks with Israel as "a good step," but said it needed to be followed by others "to ensure it is not a tactical decision."

"Our position concerning the negotiations is clear, in that we reject being dependent on the American will," said Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh, whose movement rejects any permanent accommodation with Israel.

Despite the PLO's declaration, the Palestinian leadership and Arab countries appear in no hurry to actually make the decision final. In all probability, the Americans have requested time from the Arab states to reach a compromise on the settlement issue.

A meeting of the Arab League monitoring committee on the Arab peace initiative, which was initially scheduled to decide Monday on the future of talks with Israel, was deferred until Wednesday and then again until Friday. It will be held in Libya on the sidelines of this week's Arab summit meeting there.

Abed Rabbo said the Palestinian leadership viewed Israel as responsible for the failure of the talks and for scuttling American and other international efforts. At the same time, the leadership welcomed the attempts at reconciliation with Hamas, following understandings reached last week between senior Hamas and Fatah officials on the renewal of talks between the organizations.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's office has said efforts to find a creative solution on the matter continue, but last weekend the prime minister's bureau began pointing fingers at the Palestinians in advance of a possible total halt to the talks.

Following the PLO's announcement of the suspension of talks, Netanyahu released a statement calling for Abbas to continue negotiating, with the goal of achieving a peace agreement within a year.

The prime minister said this must be achieved by sitting around the negotiating table rather than leaving it. Netanyahu has said there is still a chance that a compromise can be reached, enabling the continuation of the direct talks.

In surprise remarks, Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Ahmed Aboul-Gheit was critical in remarks to the London-based newspaper Al-Hayat of the view that there should no longer be direct talks with Israel as long as settlement construction continues.

He said such an approach would mean a lost opportunity to set the future borders of a Palestinian state. Aboul-Gheit also hinted that Hosni Mubarak would run for re-election in Egyptian presidential elections in November 2011.

Netanyahu will not agree to any compromise that involves a resumption of the settlement construction freeze. He is currently suggesting a commitment to restrained construction activity, possibly under American supervision.

He told advisers on Friday that such restrained building would not in any way affect final borders and said that unlike Israel, the Palestinians were becoming less flexible.

Nobel laureate detained

An Irish peace activist was refused entry to Israel because of her involvement in a Gaza-bound flotilla. Northern Ireland Nobel Peace Prize laureate Maisead Maquire was fighting to be allowed to enter Israel Sept. 29, a day after being detained at Ben-Gurion Airport and threatened with deportation. Maguire reportedly was told she would not be allowed to enter Israel for 10 years following her participation in a Gaza-bound aid flotilla in June. At the time she signed a document agreeing not to enter Israel again without a special permit, Ha'aretz reported. Maguire, who was scheduled to meet a group of women touring Israel and Palestinian areas to learn about the work of female peace activists, spent the night in an Israeli detention center after refusing to board a plane back to Britain, and was scheduled to have an emergency hearing at a Petah Tikvah court. She arrived in Israel the same day as the interception of a boat carrying Jewish peace activists bound for Gaza carrying a small cargo of symbolic humanitarian goods.

The Israeli Supreme Court on Monday proposed a compromise by which she could remain in Israel until Wednesday and meet as scheduled with the women's human rights delegation.

New community launched

Israel launched its first government-sponsored community for former Gaza settlers, five years after their evacuation. Five families moved Sept. 27 into Naveh, one of six towns planned for a regional community to be named Halutza several miles from the borders with Gaza and Egypt.

Soldiers convicted

An Israeli military court convicted two soldiers of using a Palestinian child as a human shield during the Gaza war. The Israeli soldiers were convicted Oct. 3 of inappropriate behavior and overstepping authority for forcing an 11-year-old Palestinian boy to open bags they believed to be armed with explosives during a search conducted in Gaza City in January 2009. They were the first convictions on the use of human shields, which is prohibited by Israeli military protocol, Ha'aretz reported.

AOL buys Israeli firm

AOL has purchased an Israeli web video start-up firm. The deal to acquire 5min Media is reported to be at about $65 million, the Israeli business daily Globes reported. The three-year-old firm produces short how-to videos, and also allows people to upload instructional videos lasting less than 5 minutes, which are popular on search engines. The company, headquartered in New York has offices in Tel Aviv, and has a library of more than 200,000 videos. It's AOL's fifth acquisition in Israel.

Obama aide steps down

JTA

WASHINGTON — Rahm Emanuel, United States President Barack Obama's chief of staff, has quit to run for Chicago mayor.

Emanuel, who resigned last Friday, reportedly was to start campaigning for the top job in his hometown on Sunday.

Emanuel focused mostly on shepherding domestic initiatives through Congress since assuming the job in January 2009. He was very involved in passing health care reform.

Rahm Emanuel

The son of an Israeli doctor who moved to the United States in the 1950s, Emanuel, who speaks Hebrew, also played a role in reaching out to Israeli leaders when tensions between the Obama and Netanyahu administrations flared earlier this year over settlement building.

Emanuel spoke emotionally of his parents at his departure ceremony.

"Both my parents raised me to give something back to the country and the community that has given us so much, and I want to thank you for the opportunity to repay in a small portion of the blessings this country has given my family," he said to Obama. "I give you my word that even as I leave the White House, I will never leave that spirit of service behind."

Peter Rouse, a senior aide, was named to replace Emanuel. Rouse, who was Obama's chief of staff when he was a senator from Illinois, has close relations with Jewish groups.

Berlusconi Jewish joke draws rebuke from Vatican

By SAVIONA MANE

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

ROME — The Vatican journal and the Italian bishops' daily newsletter condemned a "Jewish joke" told by Italian Prime Minister Sylvio Berlusconi on his birthday last week.

Berlusconi, who turned 74, jocularly told well wishers a joke about about a Jew that charged another Jew 3,000 euros a day to hide him during the Holocaust. "The Jew says, the question now is whether we should tell him Hitler is dead and the war is over," Berlusconi recounted as the punchline.

The joke, which was recorded on video, was quickly distributed on the Internet by major daily La Repubblica.

"This is an offense to the sacred memory of six million victims of the Holocaust," the Vatican newspaper L'Osservatore Romano wrote. The Bishops' newspaper Avvenire also slammed Berlusconi.

Amos Luzatto, former head of the Jewish community of Italy, told daily La Stampa that "a public figure should act with a degree of caution," noting the joke was reinforcing one of the worst anti-Semitic stereotypes.

Berlusconi's joke comes only days after public outrage over comments by his close associate Giuseppe Ciarrapico, who mocked dissidents in the ruling party by asking if they've ordered themselves skullcaps yet, "because he who betrays once, always betrays."

This is not the first time Berlusconi has tried to joke about Jews and the Holocaust. Last month, he told a joke about Hitler being persuaded to return to power, and warning that "this time, I'm going to be evil."

In 2003, he claimed that Italian Fascist leader Benito Mussolini "did not kill anyone, but sent people to vacation."

CNN sacks anchor

JTA

WASHINGTON — CNN fired anchorman Rick Sanchez after he suggested that Jews run the news business.

Sanchez made his remarks in a freewheeling exchange Sept. 30 with Pete Dominick, a Latino stand-up comedian and radio show host. Dominick is friends with Jon Stewart, the faux-news Comedy Central star who has made Sanchez's robust style the butt of many jokes.

Rick Sanchez

Sanchez, a native of Cuba, alleged that Stewart singled him out because of white bigotry.

Dominick pushed back, saying that Stewart, because he is Jewish, is himself a member of a minority.

"I'm telling you that everybody who runs CNN is a lot like Stewart, and a lot of people who run all the other networks are a lot like Stewart, and to imply that somehow they, the people in this country who are Jewish, are an oppressed minority? Yeah," he said.

On Oct. 1, Sanchez's 3 p.m. broadcast did not appear. At 6 p.m., in a short statement, CNN said he no longer worked for the network.

Music network head connects with young audiences

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Brad Schwartz, the senior vice-president and general manager of the Much MTV Group, says 1992 was a momentous year in his life.

"I was a little 21-year-old kid living in New York City for the first time, working for Lorne Michaels – another great Canadian Jewish man – who became my mentor. I learned a tremendous amount from him working at Saturday Night Live," Schwartz says from his downtown Toronto office at CTVglobemedia.

Schwartz is now at the helm of CTV's MuchMusic and MTV channels which broadcast hit shows aimed at young audiences, including Degrassi, Pretty Little Liars and Jersey Shore.

His passion for the arts began at Toronto's Young People's Theatre when he was 11 years old. He also acted at summer camp and at Port Hope's Trinity College, his high school, where he won the best actor award.

At the University of Pennsylvania, Schwartz graduated with a degree in communications and marketing. He took a directing class and worked on a few plays, but once he became Michaels' assistant at Saturday Night Live, he began to focus on television.

"It happened to be an amazing year – it was Saturday Night Live's highest rated year ever. It was an election year, and nobody does political humour better than Saturday Night Live," the Toronto-born Schwartz says.

Musical guests on the show that year ranged from Mick Jagger to Madonna to Paul McCartney. It was also the year that David Letterman left NBC for CBS, and NBC asked Michaels to create a new late-night show to follow The Tonight Show.

"So there I was, learning from Lorne again as we created the Conan O'Brien Show – not a bad young apprentice year!" Schwartz says with a laugh.

Schwartz then went to Broadway Video, Michaels' production company. "There, I managed rock bands and worked on comedy records they were producing for Jimmy Fallon and Norm MacDonald."

When Michaels bought The Burly Bear Network, a TV station for college and university students, Schwartz became director of marketing and business development, helping build it into the largest college television network in the United States.

After Burly Bear was sold to National Lampoon in 2002, Schwartz became director of Global Marketing Partnerships at MTV Networks International based in New York, the largest television network in the world, with a reach of more than a billion people.

When MTV Networks International partnered with CTV in 2005 to bring MTV to Canada, Schwartz returned to his native land.

"After CTV closed the deal, they needed someone to run it, and I guess I was the only Canadian in the room," Schwartz jokes.

In 2006, Schwartz was named one of the Top 35 Under 35 by The Hollywood Reporter.

One of his proudest accomplishments is the annual MuchMusic Video Awards show that recently brought some spectacular talent to Toronto including its host Miley Cyrus and performers Katy Perry, Adam Lambert, Drake and Justin Bieber.

Brad Schwartz

"That's one of those nation-building events that pulls together young people all across the country into one big evening. We had the biggest numbers ever on that show. It's currently the No. 1 show for total audience in all of specialty TV, if you don't count sports," Schwartz says.

He's also very proud of MTV Canada's The After Show, hosted by Dan Levy and Jessi Cruikshank, which gave audiences a platform to discuss the reality show The Hills, about a group of Los Angeles friends.

"The After Show was way ahead of its time. One of the big trends we've noticed in young people is the communication explosion – young people are communicating with each other more than any time in history, whether it's through their mobile phones or texting or Twitter or through Facebook," Schwartz says.

"We created a show that hit all of those trends. It broke the mould – there was a two-way conversation featuring live webcams, a live television audience, phone questions, twitter questions. It became a show that gathered the community of Hills' fans across the country and gave them a place to talk. This show became like a live Facebook group, and the end result made our audience closer, [more] connected to us."

Schwartz takes the responsibility of running a network that speaks to over 40 per cent of young Canadians very seriously by supporting organizations like Free The Children, War Child, Plan Canada and Kids Help Phone.

"That's very important to us. Even though we can air Jersey Shore, Teen Mom and Degrassi, we also have to do some good, and I'm very proud of all the good that we do," he says.

Schwartz is excited about their fall TV lineup, which will include the return of the popular MuchOnDemand, a live show that features VJs interviewing top artists. The show went on hiatus while they reconstructed the set into a high-definition studio, but it will be coming back at the end of October or early November.

Schwartz and his team are also developing another show with Dan Levy, whom he considers a special Canadian talent.

"I've always loved being surrounded by creative people, whether it's at Saturday Night Live or here at MuchMusic and MTV," Schwartz says. "What I love to do is find the highest mountaintop, take the biggest megaphone and scream to the widest audience about that amazing creative content. I love creativity and try and connect it to people."

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

L'Shana Tova!

A New Year and a Time of Thanksgiving

Recently we took the time to reflect on the past year and anticipate the coming year.
Very soon we will also give thanks for the abundance we enjoy in our lives – not only for the material necessities and all of the niceties, but also for the good times we spend with family, friends and colleagues who enrich us.

We need to be especially thankful if we are also able to appreciate all that we have without worry, because we have established a financial plan that we will leave loved ones debt-free, maintaining their lifestyle; that will protect us if we become disabled through illness or injury; and that allows us to look forward to a long and healthy retirement with enough income to maintain our own lifestyles; and do all of this while paying as little in taxes as is legally possible.

That is also called "Peace of Mind" and that is what we have been providing for over 44 years!

The picturesque towns of Monet's Normandy

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

On the Norman coast between Fécamp and Le Havre with its boundless space and windswept waves, the artist Claude Monet spent a childhood of play and discovery. The hollows in cliffs carved out by the pounding sea were places to explore when he ran and played on mats of grass covering the cliffs. The shrieks of seagulls hovering in the upwinds were the cry of nature while sea and sky appeared in moods of constant change

"School was like a prison," Monet later said of his youth. His Norman character, stubborn, seeking independence, and his reluctance to submit to authority, may have had its roots here on the English Channel coast.

It was in the harbour at Fécamp that Monet, when destitute, thrown out of an inn and driven to despair, attempted to drown himself. It was a foolish thing, but "no harm came to me," he wrote to his close friend artist Frederic Bazille.

Along the road that skirts the coast, you come the small town of Yport, where you can watch fishermen mending their nets while the expanse of the channel looms in the hazy distance. Farther on this road, where green pastures with grazing cattle accompany you, lies Etretat, a pretty resort situated between cliffs that open to a pebble-stoned beach. During the season, the town is full of life and when the sea is calm, the little bay is dotted with windsurfers and sailboats. The cliffs are the most beautiful in this area, called the Côte d'Albatre, the Alabaster Coast

On the right-hand side of the beach is the Falaise d'Amont, while to the left stands the imposing Falaise d'Aval. On the Falaise d'Amont, which can be reached by car, is a small museum and a monument dedicated to two aviators who in, May 1927, attempted a flight from Paris to New York. They were last sighted over Etretat and never seen again. Neither their bodies nor the wreckage of the plane was ever found.

Walk along the crest of the Falaise d'Aval with the channel on your right and meadows on your left, and soon another vista unfolds with the chalk-white Aiguille d'Etretat, the Needle of Etretat, rising from the blue waters. The sight is nothing less than spectacular and immediately evokes Monet's seascapes. The artist painted here during better times in 1883, and you'll wonder how he managed to descend to the secluded beach below which seems accessible only by rowboat.

Further west, the estuary of the Seine comes into sight, marrying the river with the sea. Here at Sainte-Adresse, a suburb of Le Havre and Monet's hometown, tall cliffs tower over the channel. On a grassy plateau that falls abruptly down to the channel, children play and people walk their dogs. You can look down on Le Havre and its harbour where ferries depart for the British Isles while freighters steam to and fro or lie anchored farther out.

Sainte-Adresse used to be a fishing village, but thanks to the initiative of a Paris merchant it evolved before World War I into a pleasant town with villas facing the sea, most of them, one would imagine, homes of retired sea captains.

The Côte de Grace lies on the opposite side of the estuary. Its principal town is Honfleur, a fishing community and a delightful market town. You can reach Honfleur from Le Havre on the Pont de Normandie, but if you take the Tancarville Bridge farther upstream, the approach is more rewarding as the road brings you to Honfleur. You'll pass through a lovely countryside of half-timbered farmhouses, meadows and sloping apple orchards, while here and there on your right, you'll glimpse the shining band of the Seine.

You would agree with Monet's friend Bazille when he first laid eyes on this countryside. The friends were travelling downriver on a steamboat from Rouen to Honfleur, and impressed by the banks of the Seine with its lush greenery, Bazille, more accustomed to the rocks and pines of his native Midi, wrote to his parents in Montpellier, "You will not see richer meadows or more beautiful trees anywhere; horses and cattle graze freely everywhere."

The friends took rooms at a baker's shop and spent their days painting at a farm called Saint-Siméon located on the heights above Honfleur. There they worked with Eugène Boudin and other artists. It was Boudin, a son of Honfleur, who discovered caricatures by the young Monet displayed in a framemaker's window. Boudin was a passionate painter of the sea, but loved even more to paint the sky with its endless changing clouds. He encouraged Monet to work in the open air, and the young artist entered a world of magic. "It was as if a veil had been removed," Monet recalled later.

A general view of Etretat [Wolf Arnold photos]

A bakery shop in Honfleur

Boudin taught him that the changing light of the day changes the scene from moment to moment before the eye of the painter, that perception was everything.

Boudin also introduced his fellow painters to the Côte de Grace, among them the Realist master Gustave Courbet and the Dutch artist Johann-Barthold Jongkind. They congregated at the Saint-Siméon, where the owner, a kindly woman called Mère Toutain, provided for a variety of artists and sometimes fed, consoled and lodged them. Now a country hotel with a restaurant, the Saint-Siméon is the most famous watering hole in this neck of the woods.

Since then, painters and men of letters have journeyed to Honfleur, drawn by its beauty and quiet. The town's heart, the Vieux Bassin, is the main attraction with its slate-covered buildings, tall and narrow, which reflect in the water, their shimmering image reminiscent of an Impressionist painting.

Try to get the flavour of this historic place by strolling along the picturesque streets and try to find the rue de la Bavolle, which Monet painted, then reward yourself with a visit at a restaurant in the place Ste. Catherine. From here you can observe life in this charming town, stroll around the old harbour from which Samuel de Champlain set sail for Canada, or just walk over to the jetty and watch the fishing boats returning from the sea.

At the Grand Palais in Paris, the first retrospective in 30 years shows works by Claude Monet. The show runs until January 2011.

Eleven of Monet's studies of the Rouen Cathedral will be on display at the city's Musée des Beaux-Arts.

The Concert mixes comedy with tragedy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Radu Mihaileanu's The Concert is an eclectic film in tone and content, blending comedy with drama and nobility of the soul with ugly anti-Semitism.

It opens at the Cumberland Theatre in an exclusive engagement on Friday, Oct. 8.

Unfolding in Moscow and Paris and shot through with black-and-white flashbacks, the two-hour film focuses on Andrei Filipov (Aleksei Guskov), a celebrated Russian conductor whose career was destroyed during the Soviet Communist era after he refused to sack his Jewish musicians.

Filipov's courageous act of defiance cost him dearly. Branded as an "enemy of the people," he was summarily fired from the Bolshoi Orchestra, though he was permitted to stay on as a cleaner.

Thirty years on, Filipov finds an ingenious though risky way to exact sweet revenge on his tormentors.

Seizing a fax from a French cultural institution inviting his company to perform in Paris, he devises a scheme in which he and 55 cast-off musicians will impersonate the Bolshoi.

Filipov's wife, Irina (Anna Kamenkova), is ecstatic, saying she has been waiting patiently for this moment.

The Concert, based on a screenplay by its director, switches back and forth between the present and the past.

In the first grainy flashback signifying Filipov's fall from grace, a Communist functionary, a true apparatchik, breaks his baton in mid-performance and abruptly ends the concert.

The incident reminds this viewer of the 19th-century Alfred Dreyfus anti-Semitic affair. After being unjustly accused of being a German spy, the Jewish artillery officer was thrown out of the French army, his sword broken in half in a humiliating ceremony.

Having decided on vengeance, Filipov enlists the assistance of a former nemesis, Ivan Gavrilov (Valeriy Barinov), the man who originally broke his baton. Recognizing Gavrilov's skills as a wily negotiator, Filipov asks him to cut a lucrative deal with the French.

As Gavrilov, an anti-Semite, wheels and deals, Filipov rounds up a rag-tag bunch of musicians who have since been employed in other fields. They include a Roma violinist, a cab driver, a flea market trader and an old Jewish friend, Sacha Grossman (Dmitri Nazarov), a beefy fellow who happens to be a gifted cellist.

As The Concert moves forward, it becomes something of a farce, poking malicious fun at the crass materialism and pomposity of contemporary Moscow society since the dissolution of communism.

In an uproarious scene, perhaps the funniest, Filipov's musicians, now in Paris, clamour for their rooms in a luxurious hotel and loudly demand food and cigarettes.

No wonder Filipov describes them as "washed-up bums."

The Concert takes a serious turn as Filipov reflects on his banishment from the Bolshoi. "It was nothing heroic," he says of his decision to try to protect his Jewish musicians from the wrath of Soviet-style anti-Semitism. He was merely attempting to preserve the integrity of the orchestra, he explains.

His listener, a beautiful young French violinist (Melanie Laurent), has a murky personal history that the film later elaborates upon in a touching vignette.

The Concert, climaxing with a rousing rendition of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto No. 5 that brings down the house in waves of applause, is ultimately a feel-good movie tinged by tragedy and humour.

Hebrew letters and Kabbalah yoga

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hebrew letters have transformed Audi Gozlan's life.

Or so he claims.

Gozlan, a certified yoga instructor from Montreal, has devised a new discipline he describes as Kabbalah yoga.

A fusion of the meditative art of yoga and the ancient secrets of Kabbalah, it is a system based on shaping the body into the postures of the Hebrew alphabet.

On Oct. 10, starting at 9 a.m. and continuing at 11:30 a.m. and 6 p.m. on the Body, Mind & Spirit channel (Bell TV 606 and Shaw Direct 575), he kicks off a series of programs called Kabbalah Yoga with Audi Gozlan.

Filmed on location in Israel and Canada, the program shows you how to tap into your "essence" and thereby achieve greater self-awareness of your "divine self."

By way of example, Gozlan shapes himself into a number of Hebrew letters as he demonstrates his techniques on a barren hill in the Judean Desert and in a Montreal studio adorned with stained glass windows.

Inhaling and exhaling, Gozlan runs through a series of letters, claiming that "yud" stands for humility while "lamed" represents a heart filled with understanding.

Asserting that Kabbalah yoga enables you to balance mind and body, Gozlan presents it as an physical education and mystical system that can improve and uplift your life.

Audi Gozlan demonstrates his techniques in the Body, Mind & Spirit channel's Kabbalah Yoga program.

There will also be a screening of the Canadian-made film The Quarrel (1991), based on Grade's story My Quarrel with Hersh Rasseyner.

YIVO has also mounted a display of the various pertinent books, manuscripts and letters by Grade in its collection. These may include the series of about 50 letters that Grade sent to a Toronto couple, Sally and the late Leon Eisner. The Canadian Jewish News assisted Sally Eisner in donating the letters to YIVO three years ago.

What likely won't be included are the various papers that Grade left behind when he died in 1982, and which his widow, Inna Hecker Grade, had fiercely guarded in the intervening years until her death last May.

Ms. Grade had denied all requests from publishers and literary scholars to examine the papers. Because she died without a will or survivors, a Bronx public administrator has taken over the estate. The administrator has invited four interested institutions, including YIVO, to examine the papers and suggest how they might be preserved.

Another of the institutions invited to examine the papers was the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass. "This is our thrilling moment in Yiddish literature, this is our Dead Sea Scrolls," Aaron Lansky, its president, told the New York Times in May.

Names in the News II: This column is not officially a fan of Ozzy Osbourne, the English rock performer and reality television star. However, in our books, the mere fact that he eagerly performed in Israel last week puts him in a positive light, given the recent regrettable cancellations by a few international artists.

Ynet, the Internet news service, reported that Osbourne, who held a press conference with his wife Sharon at his Tel Aviv hotel, shrugged off any suggestion that he boycott Israel for political reasons. He said that he tries to stay away from politics because "I wouldn't know what I was talking about."

Civil rights museum shines a light on American history

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

MEMPHIS, Tenn. — In solemn and ringing tones, the American constitution enshrines the hallowed principles of egalitarianism and democracy for all its citizens. But for much of its history, the United States was hardly the land of freedom and opportunity for African-Americans

The injustices they endured for far too long shine through like a beacon of light at the National Civil Rights Museum, which is one of the most impressive museums I've had the privilege of visiting

The museum, in downtown Memphis, essentially recounts the story of the American civil rights movement, whose struggles to beat back racism and force the United States to live up to its highest ideals is an inspirational chapter in the cause of human rights in one of the world's oldest democracies

Appropriately enough, the museum is housed in the old Lorraine Motel (450 Mulberry St.), where an iconic and ultimately tragic figure of the civil rights movement, Martin Luther King Jr., was assassinated by James Earl Ray on April 4, 1968. After King's murder, the segregated motel, located in an African-American neighbourhood, went into a steep decline and eventually closed.

Concerned that the property might be demolished by developers, the Martin Luther King Memorial Foundation purchased it in 1982 with the intention of building a museum. Construction began in 1987. The museum opened four years later.

Although it focuses on the travails of African-Americans, the museum acknowledges the role of foreign-born Americans in the fight against the twin scourges of racism and xenophobia.

Frances Slanger, a Jewish woman born in Lodz, Poland, in 1913 is cited as an example.

A nurse, she served with the 45th Field Hospital during World War II. Killed in a German artillery barrage, she was the first American nurse to die in the Normandy landings in France in 1944.

Adjacent exhibits pay homage to 22 Asian-Americans who won the Medal of Honour and to Helen Suzman, a Jewish South African parliamentarian who spoke up against the evils of apartheid.

This sign recalls the murder of Martin Luther King Jr.

The Lorraine Motel, now part of the National Civil Rights Museum

From the earliest slave revolts in the British colonies to uprisings in the 18th and 19th centuries, African-Americans fought for their rights in a struggle punctuated by tragedy, violence, courage and strength.

Through its exhibits, consisting of photographs, documents, posters, letters and memorabilia, the museum makes it clear that the battle for human rights in America was both violent and peaceful.

The rebel Nat Turner, the subject of a novel by William Styron, turned to violence, but the abolitionists William Lloyd Garrison, John Brown and Frederick Douglass preferred non-violence.

The legal struggle for equality hit a roadblock in the mid-19th century with the Dred Scott case, but the 1862 Emancipation Proclamation, enacted by president Abraham Lincoln during the U.S. Civil War, formally abolished slavery.

The 13th, 14th and 15th amendments, passed in the wake of the Civil War, respectively outlawed slavery, denied states the right to abridge the rights and privileges of U.S. citizens and granted Americans the right to vote, regardless of race and religion. These landmark amendments were complemented by civil rights acts passed by the U.S. Congress.

But after Reconstruction, an era during which federal troops occupied the South and African-Americans won many rights, a reactionary period of retrenchment set in. The Ku Klux Klan emerged and Jim Crow laws limiting the freedom of African-Americans went into effect.

With the 1896 Plessy vs. Ferguson U.S. Supreme Court verdict, the 19th century ended with the races firmly segregated.

Some African-American leaders, namely Booker T. Washington, stoically accepted the status quo, urging hard work and patience. But as a panel of stark photographs of race riots in New York, Atlanta and Houston suggests, some African-Americans staunchly rejected his accommodationist philosophy. Still other African-Americans, such as the firebrand Marcus Garvey, gave up on America altogether and founded the Back to Africa movement.

In a jolting reminder that racism reigned supreme for decades after the Civil War, the museum displays "colored section" signs that shamefully circumscribed the rights of African-Americans at public facilities ranging from hotels to restaurants.

Documented, too, is the rise of the NAACP (the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People) and the National Urban League, both of which were in the forefront of combating racism. But as another exhibit reminds a visitor, segregated units in the American armed forces were common before and during World War II.

The museum also chronicles major developments of the 1950s and 1960s: the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in the Brown vs. the Topeka Board of Education case, the desegregation of Central High School in Little Rock, Ark., the standoff pitting the University of Mississippi against the federal government in the James Meredith case, the voter registration drives, the sit-ins, the freedom rides and the bus boycotts, all of which unfolded in the South.

Reproductions of newspaper headlines recall those chaotic days, as do FBI "missing" posters of civil rights workers Andrew Goodman, Michael Schwerner and James Cheney, who were murdered by the Ku Klux Klan in Mississippi.

As their cold-blooded murders suggest, American Jews were visibly involved in the struggle for the full emancipation of African-Americans. An inflammatory poster published by the racist National States Rights party, based in Savannah, Ga., attests to this fact. Accusing Jews of encouraging "race mixing," it singles out Arthur Spingarn, a Jewish founder and supporter of the NAACP, for opprobrium.

At the end of the tour, Martin Luther King's room at the Lorraine Motel comes into view. Chilling the blood, it reminds a visitor that the struggle for human rights is a never-ending task.

A balanced biography of the seventh Chabad rebbe

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For a small and formerly obscure rabbinic sect, Chabad Lubavitch is disproportionately influential, both in the Diaspora and Israel.

Although Chabad has only about 40,000 active followers – some 10,000 in Brooklyn's Crown Heights district, 5,000 in Kfar Chabad in Israel and perhaps another 25,000 throughout the rest of the world – its presence is felt quite strongly in the Jewish world.

Chabad morphed into a significant religious force under the leadership of its seventh rebbe, the late Menachem Mendel Schneerson. "He breathed new life into a chassidic movement that most observers thought had been crippled by the blows of Zionism, communism, Nazism and Americanism," write Samuel Heilman and Menachem Friedman in The Rebbe: The Life and Afterlife of Menachem Mendel Schneerson, published by Princeton University Press.

In their balanced account, Heilman and Friedman, professors of sociology at Queens College in New York City and Bar-Ilan University in Tel Aviv respectively, focus on the rebbe's formative years, his ascent to prominence, his contributions to Chabad and his embrace of an ancient idea, messianism.

Born in Russia in 1902, he was the scion of a long rabbinical line, his maternal great-great-grandfather having been a student of the third Lubavitcher rebbe.

Interestingly enough, he acquired a secular education, his tutor having been a confirmed socialist and Zionist who would immigrate to Palestine, join a kibbutz and become a cabinet minister in one of Israel's first governments.

The rebbe cultivated his interest in science in Leningrad, where he met his wife, Chaya Moussia. Later, in Paris and Berlin, he studied mathematics, chemistry, physics and engineering, hoping to pursue a career as an engineer.

The rebbe's predecessor and father-in-law, Rabbi Yosef Yitzhak, escaped Nazi tyranny by immigrating to the United States. The rebbe himself, after a sojourn in Latvia, arrived in New York City in 1941 via Spain and Portugal.

Prior to being crowned rebbe in 1951, he lived a life that was neither "distinctively chassidic nor Jewishly insular," the authors say.

Indeed, he continued his studies in engineering and worked as an assembler of electrical circuits at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. (His younger brother, Leibel, a Trotskyist, settled in Tel Aviv and lived a totally secular lifestyle).

Though he carried out some missions and tasks for his father-in-law, he remained a largely unknown figure to rank-and-file Chassidim. But those who knew him on a first-hand basis were impressed by his Jewish knowledge and easy charm, according to the authors.

It was widely assumed that Rabbi Yosef Yitzhak would be succeeded by his right-hand man and older son-in-law, Shmaryahu Gourary. But when Schneerson was drafted, he was careful not to accept the position of rebbe until he was certain there would be little or no resistance. Within Gourary's circle, "embers of resistance" flickered, but they were systematically doused.

The new rebbe faced three formidable challenges.

First, he had to deal with the messianic fervour Rabbi Yosef Yitzhak had nurtured but not fulfilled. Second and third, he had to recalibrate his community's stance toward Zionism and the United States.

Heilman and Friedman elaborate, "The previous two Lubavitcher rebbes had waged an intense war against Zionism, which they dismissed as false messianism. America posed similar challenges...excoriated as a trefene medina (impure state)."

Distinguishing himself from the Satmar sect, whose leader considered the United States destructive to Jewish traditions, the rebbe adopted a different approach. Though he concurred with the Satmar belief that outside culture was corrosive and seductive, he wanted to engage and change it.

He did so by sending shluchim, or missionaries, to the furthest reaches of the earth. As the authors put it, "The missionary imperative became the special concern of Menachem Mendel Schneerson." His primary targets were non-religious Jews with a minimal Jewish education.

"By the time of Rabbi Menachem Mendel's death in 1994, there were thousands of shluchim scattered across the globe, in places as exotic as Katmandu, Nepal...and as mundane as Long Island, New York," Heilman and Friedman write.

They add that the sending of emissaries to cities around the world was an old idea, having been started in earnest by the fifth and sixth rebbes. Unlike them, however, the seventh rebbe dispatched young married couples, charging them with the task of "saving" assimilated Jews.

For a long time, the rebbe believed that the secular state of Israel was an enormous obstacle to his messianic program of redemption. Like haredi Jews, he claimed that the Jewish state was a heretical challenge to Jewish tradition.

But after Rabbi Yosef Yitzhak established a settlement in Kfar Chabad, attitudes to Israel within Chabad mellowed, hastened by Israel's victory in the Six Day War.

In the wake of the 1967 war, Chabad intensified its work in Israel. Menachem Begin's election as prime minister in 1977 solidified ties between Chabad and Israel. Less than a month after his triumph at the polls, Begin met with the rebbe in Crown Heights, the latter urging him to retain the territories captured in the Six Day War.

The rebbe was of the view that Israel's retention of the West Bank, Gaza Strip, Golan Heights and Sinai Peninsula could bring about the coming of the messiah and, thus, redemption.

The theme that the arrival of the messiah, or mashiach, was imminent became a recurring leitmotif during the childless rebbe's four-decade reign.

His acolytes went further, claiming that the rebbe had to be the messiah. Their belief, curtly dismissed in non-chassidic quarters, was based on the rebbe's piety, knowledge and erudition, his ability to speak foreign languages, his access to world leaders and the mass media, the collapse of the Soviet Union and the defeat of Iraq in the Gulf War.

Heilman and Friedman suggest that Chabad's fortunes may dim in the future. In the "marketplace of ideas in the modern world, where religion is a lifestyle choice and no longer a matter of fate, Orthodox Judaism, let alone Chabad Chassidism, is not an easy sell."

As well, they write, Chabad must now compete with all sorts of other "spiritual attractions," from Aish HaTorah to New Age groups.

During his life, the rebbe reinvigorated Chabad. But now that he is gone and the messiah has not appeared in a blinding flash of redemption, "the future can only promise disappointment or the emergence of a new sort of Judaism," Heilman and Friedman conclude.

Ethiopian Jew's rescue to Israel

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

Cry of the Giraffe (Annick Press) is intended by its author Judie Oron for young adults. Older adults, however, ought not be deterred from reading the book.

It is a gripping, high-drama, life-and-death tale of a teenager's liberation from slavery and degradation and her hair-raising rescue to Israel.

Based on a true story, Cry of the Giraffe recounts the story of Wuditu, daughter of Berihun. Wuditu and her family are Beta Israel, Jews from Ethiopia, who were able eventually to rebuild their lives in Israel.

Scorned, hated and derided by their fellow countrymen as "Falashas," the pejorative epithet given to the Jews of Ethiopia, Wuditu and her family set out on the long, dangerous march through Sudan, that was to take them to Yerusalem, the Land of Israel.

But all their planning and precaution collapse in the chaos of hostile soldiers, rebels, bandits and an unrelentingly harsh climate and topography. Wuditu is separated from her family and through a confluence of unforeseen, ill-fated events is left behind.

She is enslaved by ruthless exploiters and suffers calamitous indignity. But she never loses hope. And though her strength wanes and flags, she never loses her courage. Inspired especially by the memories of the image of her younger sister, Lewteh, and the guiding words of her mother, whom she assumes are safe in Israel, Wuditu overcomes the ugly, dark, frightening adversity that is unimaginable to most of us.

Wuditu narrates.

Oron, a former Montrealer who now lives in Toronto, is an experienced journalist and writer. She tells the story in Wuditu's voice unsparingly, capturing the innocence and the determination of the youngster, as well as many of the harrowing details of the child's suffering. Indeed, a young person will require adult supervision when reading some of the details of the story, as well as an explanation of them. Many of the individuals along Wuditu's path to rescue were unsavoury. Many of the occurrences were shudderingly harsh.

Adding to the extraordinary poignancy of the book, Oron was the woman who actually rescued Wuditu.

Today, Oron views Wuditu and Lewteh as daughters. Wuditu considers Oron's rescue of her from Ethiopia as the moment of her second birth.

In an interview with The CJN (Sept. 2 issue), Oron explained, "I wanted people to know what a hero my daughter had been and how brave the Ethiopian community was."

She succeeds entirely.

Cry of the Giraffe will be launched in Toronto on Oct. 12 at the Gladstone Hotel from 6:00 to 8:00 p.m. Oron also appears at the Jewish Book Fair in Toronto on Oct. 28.

Schachter sitting on top of beach volleyball world

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Sam Schachter looks into the future of beach volleyball, he's actually looking in the mirror.

A few weeks ago, that was hardly the case. He and his playing partner Garrett May were ranked 18th going into the under-21 world beach volleyball championships in Analya, Turkey, but after posting a 7-0 tournament record and knocking off No. 2 seeds, Brazil, in the gold medal game, the two Toronto players are sitting on top of the world.

It was the first time Canada won a medal of any kind at the championship, and the feat is all the more remarkable because Schachter and May were only thrown together about three or four weeks before, when Schachter's regular partner was unable to play because of injury.

"In three weeks, we beat the world," Schachter said in the heady aftermath of the win.

"I can't find words for it. You're not winning a gold for yourself, but for your country."

The Canadian duo defeated second-seeds Alvaro Filho and Vitor Felipe of Brazil 21-23, 21-16 and 15-13 to win the gold medal.

May, 18, and Schachter, 20, lost three sets over the course of the entire tournament. Besides the second-seed Brazilians, they also knocked off the sixth, seventh and 10th seeds, Volleyball Canada reported.

Coming into the event in Analya, Schachter and May had finished fifth in the Canadian nationals (played against older players) and, playing with other partners, Schachter had finished fourth in two North, Central America and Caribbean Volleyball Confederation (NORCECA) regional pro events. His best previous showing at the worlds was a ninth place finish.

So what happened in Analya?

"I don't think we played above ourselves," the six-foot-five Schachter said. "We kind of figured it out" and continued to improve throughout. "We figured out the dynamics together. We were stronger mentally than the others, we didn't let a bad call bother us. Other teams got rattled and lost points in bunches."

"We had a really solid defence, set up and co-ordinated really well together... and our 'side out' [ending the other team's serves] was good."

Playing in blistering heat that Schachter estimates hovered around 35 C, the Canadians took a medical time out in the third and deciding set when they trailed 7-4. "I could barely breathe out there," he said. It was one of the few points in the tournament when the Canadians were in danger, the other being in the quarter-finals versus the United States. After a rest, Schachter and May rebounded, took control and ended up with a 15-13 victory.

Sam Schachter tests his medal to make sure its really gold.

Schachter's dad, Jon, who attended the tournament, was justifiably proud of his son. "Sam has worked incredibly hard throughout the summer preparing for this event, and he displayed incredible heart winning three tough matches in 30 degree heat," he said.

"Then in the finals, he and his partner, Garrett May, beat a highly ranked and skilled team from Brazil. It's certainly a fun thing to say your son is a 'world champion,' but what makes me proudest is how he conducted himself throughout the tournament. Sam and Garrett supported each other at all times and sent a strong message to each other and to their competitors, they were not to be broken. When they played the Canadian national anthem after presenting the gold medal, I'll never forget the proud look on the boys' faces."

So what do they do for an encore?

Surprisingly, the two who meshed so well together are not slated to play together until some time next year. In the meantime, May has returned to university and is playing indoor volleyball, while Schachter is attending Wilfrid Laurier University, where he's studying communications. He hopes to complete a postgraduate degree in marketing.

As for volleyball, he'll continue to work out with the national team, commuting from Waterloo, Ont., twice a week to train during the winter at Beach Blast in Toronto.

He'll also continue to participate in FIVB (the international volleyball federation) tournaments and NORCECA biannual national events.

In the meantime, it's nice to be at the top of your game. "We seem to be the future," he said, "the top level of our generation."

And he's got the medal to prove it.

Time and again, yes to peace

By LILAC SIGAN
Israel 21c

What a great Rosh Hashanah present from Time magazine: a cover story telling whoever is willing to listen that Israelis are not into peace. Just like that. Why? Because Israelis are making money, they got off easy with the world economic crisis, the real estate is booming even when Hamas fires rockets in the air and above all it's been over two years since the last mega-suicide bombing. In short, we're all having a ball and couldn't care less about peace. Who needs it, right?

So if for some reason we imagined that we're bummed over the unsolvable conflict with the Palestinians, if we thought the flotilla story mattered to almost every citizen here, or if we were fantasizing that we're worried about the well-being of the IDF soldiers, Gilad Schalit in particular, we were totally off.

According to Time magazine, we are all completely indifferent. It showed a photo of three guys on the beach smoking a hookah and found some old survey that "proves" only 8 per cent of Israelis are worried about the conflict, because most of them find that education and security problems are more severe.

Surprised? Probably not. This is the way the neo anti-Semitism works.

It's not open, it is sly and sophisticated. It hides behind academic lectures that select very specific articles for their arguments; it prospers behind movies that put certain things in the spotlight and ignore others and it slithers through everyday headlines that stretch the limits each time a little more. The neo anti-Semitism is so intelligent that sometimes it even catches us at a moment of insecurity and we tell ourselves "Hey, maybe it is true."

Maybe I really don't care.

So let me remind you how much we don't care. Because we don't care we continue to raise our children on songs of peace while the other side educates on hatred and violence. Because we don't care every Israeli prime minister in the past decade has tempted the Palestinian leaders with peace offers that were continuously refused. Because we don't care, tens of thousands of citizens joined a walk across Israel that called for the freedom of kidnapped soldier Gilad Schalit, whose rights have been abused for over four years.

The problem is that while we know the truth, a new truth is being formed as time goes by.

Facts do not play a role when a journalist decides on a thesis and later finds a way to "prove" it.

This is the modern politically correct way to sell lies.

The encouraging thing is that the hundreds of comments on the Time website for this article prove that we actually do care, and a lot. Most of the comments told Time magazine that the article was not journalism, it was racism.

But let's stop hating Time. Let's look at ourselves. Is it possible that we care, but we're just too quiet about it? Maybe we just don't communicate it enough.

Maybe we are so busy with defensive responses that we forget to say that we want peace. It begins with our prime minister and ministers who have to say this whenever they can, and it continues to each and every one of us. During conversations, comments or even on our Facebook page.

It may sound tedious because it seems so obvious, but it is important to say it. All the time. Why?

Mainly because it's the truth.

UNSTUFFED CABBAGE

1 large cabbage, sliced into 1/2" strips

MEAT BALLS
2 lbs. ground meat
2 eggs
4 oz. tomato sauce
3 tbls matzo meal or bread crumbs
1/2 tsp paprika
1/2 tsp garlic powder
1/2 tsp salt
1/8 tsp ground pepper

SAUCE
16 oz. tomato sauce
1/2 cp water
2 tbls lemon juice
3 tblsp brown sugar

Boil 2 c water in large soup pot. Add cabbage. Lower to medium heat; cover pot & steam 20 min.

In a bowl, mix together meatball ingredients. Form mixture into meat balls. Place balls on top of cabbage. Cover, simmer on low heat. In bowl, mix sauce ingredients. Pour on top of meatballs. Cook 1 hr., then stir. More water or tomato sauce can be added according to taste at this point. Cook another 1/2 hr, or until meat is cooked through and cabbage is tender.

About Life

Dear Ella,

In today's mail, I noticed an invitation-like envelope, hand addressed to my husband and me. As I didn't recognize the return address, I was particularly curious what this "invitation" was for. I opened the envelope to find a lovely, professionally printed card with what I thought was a smaller reply card. I started reading. It was in two parts: the first was the announcement of a marriage that had already taken place, while the second was the announcement of the forthcoming arrival of their baby. I kept reading and turned over the invitation to see what I was invited to. It was blank. I pull out the "reply" card, which listed two high-end stores that these people have registered at for baby gifts. That's it! No invite. Nothing but a card asking for a gift from us. I would love your opinion on this one.

Stunned

Dear Stunned,

While it's always nice to receive news about happy occasions, in this case, it's been overshadowed by the request for gifts. Having never heard of this type of gift-giving, I showed the invite, which you attached to your letter, to a number of people. I showed it to older people, younger people, and people in a range of socioeconomic and cultural groups. I thought, possibly, that with the fast pace of technology, such as e-mails, text messaging, social networks and e-cards, this might be a new way people are doing things. No need for an expensive wedding or baby shower – what a waste of time and money when we could simply cut to the chase and get to the important part: the gifts!

I polled more than 100 people, and the opinions were unanimous. The shock and bewildered looks I received as they realized what they were reading were all similar. Some thought maybe these people were needy, but the gift registrations were for expensive, trendy stores, so that theory was quashed. Clearly this couple was misguided and oblivious to how people would react. Maybe they received poor advice from a well-meaning friend or relative?

Whatever the reason, I can find no redeeming conclusion. I welcome any thoughts or opinions from my readers. Is this a sign of the times? Will we start seeing more of this type of gift appeal?

Meditation can de-stress anyone

Acceptance. Letting go. Letting love and goodness in and letting go of what doesn't work anymore. It's a new year and it's a chance for forgiveness, and for letting go and beginning anew. How wonderful is that? We all have that chance.

Life Coach Corner
By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

As we begin the new year, I want to share a wonderful CD with you, The Voice of Relaxation (on iTunes), created by Leonor Mowry, owner of Village Yoga. This relaxation and meditation series is designed to relax and de-stress anyone, and bring more joy into life.

What is meditation and how does it relate to letting go?

"Meditation is clearing the mind of thought…" says Mowry. " It's like a vacation for the mind, it infuses us with greater creativity, compassion and energy, and the ability to experience life one moment at a time, undistracted by thoughts of the past and the future that plague our minds, to the detriment of the potential for joy in our lives.

Another reason to meditate is to stop the worry habit. Mowry's take on worry is: "One of the biggest disservices we do in our society is we teach our children to worry. What we should be teaching them is that if they are doing their best, they're doing just fine, and to trust that all will be well.

"By meditating, you're letting go of the worries of the past or future, it makes you … less likely able to be knocked over by the harsh and disruptive thoughts that the mind creates. Meditation creates a sense of acceptance and, in acceptance, lies peace. Suffering lies in resistance, peace lies in acceptance."

If you're feeling stressed out at school or at work, Mowry offers some techniques on how to restore yourself to a feeling of being centred and calm. Here is one of them.

"Just close your eyes and imagine yourself in your favourite place in the world and focus on your breath… Take a big inhale and let out a sigh and do that three times. And imagine the stress leaving you with each sigh.

"The breath is important because it is the vehicle to the present moment. The key to happiness is being present, and the breath is the key to presence because it is happening right now."

Mowry suggests people meditate three times a week, and ideally every day. But she believes that any relaxation, even 20 minutes a week, is better than none.

I asked Mowry how forgiveness relates to letting go and to meditation.

"The heart knows how to forgive better than the mind ever can. So if you just have the intention of forgiveness, whenever you are thinking harsh thoughts, replace it with a mantra of forgiveness and say, 'I forgive and release the past,'" she said. "

The benefit to you is that eventually the forgiveness happens without you even realizing it. The heart knows how to do what the mind doesn't know how to do. You're letting go of the need to be right, to win, the need to be heard… We want to be happy, and happiness lies [in being present] and in acceptance. It doesn't lie in being right, or being hurt, or winning. If you are truly accepting, you are in the flow. You are not fighting for every step."

Thoughts on a 14-Year Marriage

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

When he asked me to marry him, the word "yes" fell from my lips immediately. It felt glorious to be in love, and there seemed nothing better than the prospect of a wedding and building a life together.

We were two twenty-somethings full of dreams, and over the years that followed we saw those dreams come to life. We graduated and slowly began chipping away at our careers. We travelled the world together, exploring burial caves in the South Pacific and marveling at rattlesnakes in the African jungle. We held hands on long walks, gazed at each other over candlelit dinners and supported each other through flu, birthing pains and the devastation of suddenly losing a parent.

It's been 14 years since we tied the knot, and I'd like to think I've learned a few things about marriage in that time.

I've learned that today's bridal magazines are full of misconceptions. They teach couples that they require a "theme" for their nuptials, a colour scheme that reflects their deep unity and an expensive gift for each member of their wedding party. They don't mention that no one cares or remembers what was on the menu, whether or not you had chair covers, the precise colour or shape of the wedding gown or the selection of music. What do your friends and family remember? How you treated each other in public, how you resolved problems when they arose and how you spoke of each other in private.

Lauren & Mark

I've learned that romance is overrated, and that true love is measured by compassion when your spouse is feeling ill, or by an offer to watch the kids so your other half can have a night out with friends. A slow walk on a beautiful night can be more meaningful than a fine restaurant meal, and a spouse who keeps loving you and thinking you're beautiful – even on your ugliest days – is one who really cares.

I've learned that money and how it is handled says a lot about a couple's trust. As children enter the family and work versus home responsibilities alter, it's good to have a strong sense of what's "ours." There's little place for possessiveness in a strong marriage, which is most often characterized by a willingness to share everything – from bank accounts to bath towels to e-mail.

I've learned that there's always opportunity to cheat on your spouse, but it's how you handle those opportunities that determine whether your marriage will make it. Will you choose to flirt, or look away? Will you declare "I'm married," or will you take off your wedding ring? We all have choices, and in love and marriage, there's no excuse and often no forgiveness for bad judgment.

I've learned that sex every night is a figment of Hollywood's imagination, a concept rendered useless in the real life world of work, dinner, children and homework. Sure, sex is important – vital, even, to the preservation of love, passion and a sense of togetherness. But quantity has nothing to do with quality in these matters, and it's the quality that counts.

Finally, I've learned there's nothing so comforting as slipping into bed every night next to the partner you love, of anticipating their phone calls, caring about their day and listening for their arrival home.

Life can be dark, disappointing and full of confusion. But a good marriage is like a beacon of light that gives you a way around the obstacles, a reason to keep going and a solace that comes from knowing there's two of you united against the world.

The Ketubah is more than a contract

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

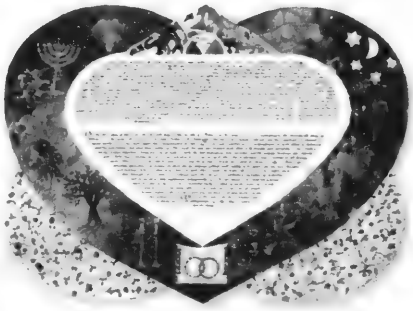
Attention prospective bridegrooms. Start looking for your zuzim (silver coins used in the second century C.E.) You will need at least 200 for a virgin bride, and 100 for a widow or divorcee, but the bride's family may hold out for more!

In 80 BCE, Simeon ben Shetach, a Pharisee (a Second Temple period Jewish religious and political party or sect) and president of the Sanhedrin (the supreme political, religious and judicial body at the time), introduced the idea of a marriage contract or ketubah for wives.

The ketubah is a written contract in which the groom promises to give his bride a certain amount of money if the marriage ends in divorce or if he does not live up to his obligations as a husband. It also guarantees money be paid should the husband die.

But a ketubah is more than that. The real purpose is to guarantee the material, social and sexual rights of a woman entering marriage and to protect her financial rights in case of divorce or death. A lower amount for one married before is not an indication of her lesser worth; rather it is a matter of the likelihood of her having some resources of her own which she is bringing into the marriage.

The ketubah is supposed to be in the bride's possession at all times. Some couples even make a duplicate of the ketubah to carry with them when they travel. If it gets misplaced, a couple is not supposed to live together until a new one is drawn up.



Decorated ketubot date back to the Jewish community of Spain, but the custom has been revitalized in the 1980s. Today many Jewish artists create decorated ketubot.

Although a ketubah is a legal document, there is no injunction in Halachah against women artists creating it. It need not be written by a scribe and may be drawn by hand or printed. The paper may be parchment or another kind of paper, but this is not required.

Two witnesses, who are not related to the bride and groom, must sign a ketubah; in some cases, both the bride and groom also sign. Orthodox rabbis only permit one who is a strict observer of mitzvot to sign.

The main restriction on a ketubah is that it be ready at the time of the betrothal and marriage blessings. Customarily, it is drawn up before the wedding and then signed prior to the ceremony. At the ceremony, the ketubah is read aloud as a bridge between the betrothal and marriage ceremonies which, today, are combined into one but were once two separate events.

Included are the obligations to the bride and the amount of zuzim exchanged; also included are the day, the city, name of bride and groom and their fathers' names.

The Conservative movement devised a pre-marital document, which the couple signs, which is added to the ketubah and read during the ceremony. This agreement is an authorization by the husband which authorizes a Bet Din (religious court) to act on his behalf and deliver a get (Jewish divorce) to his wife, should the need arise.

On occasion husbands refuse to grant the Jewish divorce out of spite or only in return for compensation. It is also used in cases where a husband is assumed dead and when a soldier is missing in action. (If there are no witnesses to his death, the woman cannot remarry and is tied to the man.)

Orthodox do not consider this document to be in compliance with Jewish law.

In New York, the "get" law states that a civil divorce will not be granted by a New York court unless obstacles to remarriage of both parties has been removed. Other courts have ruled that the ketubah is a binding contract, and that a get is the only way to dissolve the contractual stipulations.

Consider a tea party for your shower

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

During the beautiful autumn weather, an afternoon tea party is a stress-free yet elegant treat for a wedding shower. Tea sandwiches are classic, easy to prepare and best served cold or at room temperature. Desserts can be made at home or ordered from a nearby bakery.

India native Gary Walia, general manager of Tamarind Restaurant and Tea Room in New York, agrees that tea and all the ceremony surrounding it makes a gracious centrepiece for a wedding celebration

"The taking of tea has an intimacy and grace that a cup of coffee or even a flute of champagne can only aspire to," he says. With a chuckle, Walia details the first meeting between his sister and a hand-picked suitor. "In India, many marriages are arranged," he says. "My sister met her future husband for a cup of tea and by the time they emptied the teapot the deal was sealed."

Over a cup of chai tea, the prospective groom gave his would-be bride five minutes to accept his proposal. "My father loves to say, 'That was a good cup of tea,'" Walia says.

When sending out invitations, replace the "High" as in High Tea with "Afternoon." Although authentic High Tea is still taken in Great Britain by hungry youngsters, theatre-goers tiding themselves over until their late supper, or less affluent citizens who grab a hearty meal late in the day and forget dinner altogether, the tradition of afternoon tea was inaugurated in the mid-19th century.

As the story goes, when Anna, Duchess of Bedford served tea and breadstuffs at 4 p.m. because everyone was hungry and couldn't wait until dinner, they enjoyed it so much it became a national ritual.

Today, afternoon tea is so popular that the Ritz London's Palm Court has a three- to six-month waiting list, according to executive chef John Williams. There are five seatings, but the most popular is 3 p.m. The master chef is a traditionalist for his afternoon tea menu and the elegant sandwiches have few, but very specific ingredients.

Cucumber sandwiches are a must, but served only with cream cheese and chives. Mustard cress is the star of its own sandwich, with a dollop of egg mayonnaise. The smoked salmon is always on sourdough, accented by butter, black pepper and a squeeze of lemon, and his tuna is mixed with shallots, chives and crème fraiche mayonnaise.

Desserts at the Palm Court range from fruit tarts to chocolate delice to a mango-topped sponge cake and thick buttery fruitcake.

His favourite teas are Darjeeling first flush, picked from the tiniest, most tender leaves, Earl Gray infused with bergamot, an infusion of lemon verbena, fresh mint tea and South African rooibos.

It is a good idea to follow the lead of these two afternoon tea experts for the party we're about to orchestrate. We've offered slight variations to some of the petit layered sandwiches, but feel free be creative and create your own.

The tea

Tea connoisseurs describe its subtleties as they would a prized glass of wine. The well-dressed tea table offers guests several varieties.

Darjeeling tea is considered the "champagne" of teas. It is described with the same reverence as a fine bottle of wine. Darjeeling is considered a lighter afternoon tea, but the taste varies depending on the time of year the leaves are harvested.

Lapsang Souchong or Tarry Souchong is a smoked tea with the heady aroma of an oak fire. It is delicious alone or with milk and honey

Lemon Verbena is a smooth, citrus-flavoured herbal tea

Moroccan Mint is made by placing the fresh leaves and branches of the plant and infusing it with hot water and a little sugar or honey

Rooibos tea from South Africa is ruby red, smooth and comforting. Serve with lemon or milk and honey

White Peony tea is delicate, refined and filled with healthy antioxidants. White tea is the new green. Chai is basically black tea brewed with selected spices and milk.

Buying tea

Try to find small farm teas that are hand-picked and not machine processed. Buying in bulk rather than a package usually yields fresher, higher quality tea.

Brewing the perfect pot

1. Choose a good teapot — clay, porcelain, or silver. Fill pot with hot water to warm it, then discard the water.

2. Start with great-tasting cold water, spring or filtered. Do not overboil — this depletes the oxygen and tea will taste flat.

3. Add 1 heaping teaspoon of loose tea per 6-ounce cup. For stronger tea add 1 extra teaspoon for the pot. Brewing teas loose rather than in a tea ball or, heaven forbid, a bag, allows the leaves to open fully and release their flavor.

4. For black tea, as soon as water comes to rolling boil, turn off heat, wait 10 seconds and then pour into the teapot. Stir the tea; cover and let it steep for 3 to 5 minutes. When brewing red, white, green or fresh mint tea, water should be well below boiling. Steep for 5 to 8 minutes.

6. Until you are familiar with a particular tea, after a few minutes take a sip. Pay attention to taste rather than colour. When you like the flavour, place a fine strainer over a cup and pour your tea through it. You should have a perfect cup of tea.

The tea sandwich

(Some hints from party planner extraordinaire in Effortless Entertaining with Colin Cowie)

Tea sandwiches are diminutive and delicate. It takes only one or two bites to finish one, so each piece must be flavourful and distinctive.

The bread for tea sandwiches should be very thin. You can ask your bakery to cut it horizontally instead of vertically or buy a loaf of unsliced bread and slice it yourself. You can also use a rolling pin to flatten it.

Brides

Give your luncheon an elegant, timeless touch

For most of the sandwiches, you can use a spread made of equal parts softened butter and cream cheese, white pepper and a dash of Tabasco

The table

Since most afternoon tea parties are not sit down affairs, but encourage guests to mingle and graze, the tables should not only be gracious and inviting but carefully organized.

Amidst the lovely linens and sumptuous flowers, create a tea area with all the accoutrements — a sandwich section with accompanying napkins and plates and a tray of desserts. There are lovely three-tiered platters available and perfect for a tea party.

Guests can then choose which bite-size sandwiches and sweets to fill their plates with. Utensils are not usually offered as guests will be walking around nibbling from their petit plate of treasures and sipping their delicious tea.

In my grandmother's china closet I found kidney-shaped Depression glass plates with an indentation for tea cups. These are perfect for a garden party, as everything can be placed on one plate. Since tea parties are becoming a popular way of entertaining, expect some resourceful manufacturer to bring them back.

If you're not lucky enough to have a set in the family or to find them at an antique store, choose dishes, cups and glasses that are lightweight and lend themselves to being carried around.

Dress the table with linens and laces, flowers and your most beautiful silver, crystal and china.

Another lovely touch is to offer sherry, port or champagne with the tea.

SMOKED SALMON "TEA SANDWICH", WITH SMOKED GRAPES

From executive chef Matthew Levin, Lacroix at The Rittenhouse Hotel

1 lb. house smoked salmon, diced
2 shallots, diced
15 basil leaves, chiffonade
1/2 bulb fennel, diced
1 Granny Smith apple, peeled and diced zest and juice of 1 orange
4 oz. mayonnaise
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard sea salt and white pepper to taste
1 loaf seven grain bread, sliced around 1/4 in. thick
50 red skinned grapes smoked over applewood and dried fennel frowns

Combine all ingredients in a stainless steel bowl, season with salt and pepper. Right before serving, top each sandwich with half of a smoked grape. Makes 15 sandwiches

CUCUMBER SANDWICHES

4 oz. cream cheese or goat cheese
1 tsp. lemon juice
salt and white pepper to taste
8 slices white or wheat bread
1/2 English cucumber, thinly sliced
1/2 cup watercress, stemmed

Mix together cheese, lemon juice, salt and pepper. Spread on slice of bread. Top with cucumber and watercress. Cover with remaining slice. Trim crusts and cut into desired shape.

BRIE, WALNUT AND WATERCRESS SANDWICHES

From Effortless Entertaining with Colin Cowie (HarperCollins)

8 very thin slices white or brown bread
4 oz. ripe Brie, softened and rind removed
1/4 oz. chopped walnuts, lightly toasted
1/2 bunch watercress, rinsed and stems removed

Flatten bread with a rolling pin. Spread cheese on one side of the bread slices. Top with walnuts and watercress. Cover with remaining slices. Trim crusts and cut into triangles.

PUNJAB EGG SALAD SANDWICH

Inspired by Chado Tea Room, Los Angeles

2 cups Lapsang Souchong tea at room temperature
5 hard boiled eggs, left whole with shells removed
2 tbsp. mayonnaise
1 tbsp. chives, finely chopped
salt and white pepper to taste
8 slices white bread

Pour tea into a bowl. Marinate eggs in tea for 5 hours or overnight in the refrigerator.

Remove eggs from tea. In a glass bowl roughly chop the eggs. Add mayonnaise, chives, salt and pepper. Gently mix to combine. Spread a thin layer of butter on bread. Spread egg mixture over half of the bread. Cover with remaining slice. Trim crusts and cut into desired shape. Makes 16 sandwiches.

Online site catalyst for meeting mate

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

Matchmakers still exist, and people often meet through family, friends and colleagues at work; however, mature singles have another option in the 21st century.

"This is the new age of Internet dating," Marla Pinsky, 35, says, speaking for herself and her fiancé, Howard Scholl, 42. "Lifestyles have changed and so many people in our generation want to complete their education, establish careers and travel before settling down to marry and start a family. We have always led busy lives and wanted to be sure our lifelong mate would share the same traditional Jewish values and similar interests."

For Pinsky, a social worker, and Scholl, a senior IT recruiter, Internet dating (on JDate Canada) proved fruitful. They were able to study each other's profiles to ensure that they had common interests and values before chatting online and eventually meeting in person. Nowadays, career people have busy schedules and often have to cancel social engagements due to commitments, Pinsky says, noting the advantage of being able to communicate online 24/7.

Marla Pinsky and Howard Scholl

Nevertheless, Pinsky, an experienced professional, cautions women to exercise prudence when dating online. Communicate online to learn more about the individual's interests and demeanour before meeting in person. Refrain from divulging sensitive information about yourself or your family. When you actually meet, go to a public place and arrange your own transportation home. Stay alert and in control by monitoring alcohol consumption.

Pinsky and Scholl met in 2008 and became engaged this past summer. They are getting married at a downtown hotel on Sept. 11, 2011. Their delighted parents, Beverley and Harvey Pinsky and Joe and Sarah Scholl, are making the wedding.

"The date also marks my mother's birthday," Pinsky says. "We're inviting relatives and friends from Canada, the U.S. and Israel. Howard and his dad sang in the Beth Ora choir for years, so they are pleased Rabbi Marc Jablon [spiritual leader at Congregation Beth Ora in Ville St. Laurent] agreed to officiate."

An all-round individual with myriad interests and many friends, Scholl was just about to "take a break" from JDate, when he met Pinsky. Scholl advises singles "to be patient and take it slow." Pinsky and Scholl conversed for over a week on JDate before meeting in person.

"We had so much to talk about when we actually got together at a restaurant that we ended up continuing our discussion at Java U and didn't leave until the cafe was closing," Pinsky recalls, with Scholl smiling in agreement. "After that, we conversed daily, and about a month after we started going out, Howard invited me to his cousin's Chanukah party in Ottawa. I immediately felt at home with his family and we had a wonderful time."

The couple became engaged July 25. Although they had shopped for the ring together, Scholl surprised her with a romantic marriage proposal – "We were strolling in the park, and Howard suggested we sit down on a bench. Then he handed me a beautiful card, asking for my hand in marriage. I'll always treasure the moment."

Pinsky and Scholl recently purchased a condo and assumed the mammoth task of gutting and refurbishing it. "Marla is very organized and is extremely adept at home decorating," Scholl says, pointing out his fiancée is inspired by home shows on television. Since they derive pleasure from cooking and entertaining, they intend to make good use of their stylish facilities.

Scholl grew up in Chomedey, attended United Talmud Torahs, Herzliah High, Vanier College and Concordia University. Although he initially majored in biochemistry, his heart was in computers and he switched midstream. Before assuming his current position at Kovasys, a recruiting firm in Internet technology, Scholl worked in computer sales and other facets of the business. Scholl's brother, Maury, 41, is married with two children and lives in Victoria, B.C.

A trivia buff and sports fan, Scholl is on a softball team and participates in many land and water sports. Scholl and Pinsky hail from families that appreciate Jewish liturgical music, and they have both belonged to choirs.

Pinsky grew up in Cote St. Luc, attended Jewish People's and Peretz Schools, Wagar High School, Dawson College and McGill University. She was a camper at Pripstein's Camp Mishmar and a counsellor at Camp B'nai Brith and also travelled on community missions to Israel and Europe. After receiving her bachelor of social work and master of social work at McGill, Pinsky was on staff at Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (precursor to Cumming Jewish Centre for Seniors Support Services). For the past eight years, she has worked in the Home Care Department of CLSC Rene-Cassin. A few years ago, Pinsky and co-partner Katie Fagen established Senior Solutions Montreal, a private practice offering resources and services for seniors. Pinsky has two brothers, Jason, 33, who lives in Montreal, and Daniel, 31, a Toronto resident.

"We both come from close-knit families and everyone gets along beautifully," Pinsky says. "In fact, one of my brothers had known Howard from softball. As for interests, we both love to travel, and between us, there are few places that one of us hasn't visited. We exercise and keep fit. We adore movies, theatre, music, art, Judaism and Yiddishkeit. We value keeping a kosher home and maintaining Jewish traditions. In addition, we believe in giving each other space."

Now that the venue is booked, Pinsky and Scholl are attending to details. They plan to use a tallit that incorporates four tallitot from close relatives. A cousin will sing when they walk down the aisle.

"We'll also use a family kiddush cup," Pinsky says. "Unfortunately, our grandparents are deceased, but this is our way of incorporating their spirit." Young relatives will enhance the procession as ring bearers and flower girls.

Author addresses topics couples encounter in marriage

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements co-ordinator

"Why didn't anybody let us know," is a common refrain uttered by newlyweds.

As soon as they are engaged, everyone advises them about booking a band, choosing a caterer, picking a venue, and about making myriad other arrangements for the nuptials. However, nobody told them things don't fall into place after the honeymoon is over

Author Caroline Tiger, a realist, aims to set couples straight in The Newlywed's Instruction Manual distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada. The comprehensive, colourful pocket-size guide is fun to read because Tiger's sense of humour is laced throughout the seven chapters and 207 pages. In addition, the whimsical graphics by Paul Kepple and Scotty Reifsnyder are bound to elicit a chuckle.

Tiger, formerly an adjunct professor of magazine writing at Temple University and a former managing editor of The Philadelphia Magazine, continues to pen a weekly column. She devotes a section of Newlywed's Instruction Manual to debunking assumptions. Don't assume your mate can mind read what you are thinking and vice versa. Communicating is the key to getting it right, she says. Impressive illustrations accompany the text.

The first four chapters tackle all the settling in and tidying up chores related to the nuptials. Before merging into your new mutual nest, it's wise to declutter, she advises, and goes on to tell how.

With today's two career households, it's only fair to divide chores. Nevertheless, it pays to sort out each other's preferences. Even poor laundry habits can be annoying. Neither husband nor wife wants a favourite garment ruined by a mate's carelessness. Remember to empty pockets to avoid losing valuables, and items that require dry cleaning shouldn't be dumped in the washing machine.

Cooking and eating habits vary and, here again, preferences should be taken into account. "What type of courtship did you have? Was it so short that you never realized your mate insists on being served and walks away from the table like royalty without taking a dish to the sink? What about cooking, shopping and food preferences?" The author addresses these subjects and offers troubleshooting tips.

Finances, money management, household budget, fixed expenses, variables, digging yourself out of debt and ways to keep costs down are discussed in detail. She even addresses the different personalities and how couples often quibble over different views on money. She believes in bringing these matters out in the open without resorting to verbal abuse. Tiger even set aside a chapter on "How to quarrel". Rule number one, don't shy away from conflict, broach it but also be a generous listener and talk softly. Be prepared to make concessions. As for where and when to fight, she makes some good points. Avoid quarrels, when your partner is burdened with heavy-duty problems or either of you are driving. A motorist could easily become distracted and be involved in an accident.

The author provides a quiz and answers invariably reveal whether the respective individual is a saver or a spender. Chapter 3 is devoted to "The Nest" and since buying a house is probably the biggest purchase the average couple will make, it's worth a lot of consideration. Tiger does a lot of the plotting for readers to ensure they are well prepared and won't have any regrets. For fledgling homebuyers, she defines rudimentary real estate jargon.

Romance is an important part of marriage and mates should always be thinking of ways to enhance the relationship, says Tiger. Leave each other little notes and celebrate occasions such as anniversaries. Among other topics she deals with are health, sex and offspring. The book includes an informative appendix and a handy index.

Make me a match

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

What is the most famous expression of the shadchan? Undoubtedly one would say the Matchmaker song from Fiddler on the Roof.

The shadchan is the matchmaker; a shidduch is a match or system of matchmaking and shadchanut is matchmaking. The first shidduch takes place in the book of Genesis, when Eliezer chooses Rebekah for Isaac. The practice has become traditional in Judaism, although rabbinic literature does not mention the profession until the 13th century.

In Inside Judaism by Alfred J. Kolatch, there is written a conversation between a Roman matron and Rabbi Yosei ben Halafta, a second century scholar and disciple of Rabbi Akiva.

"What has your God been doing since He finished making the world?" asked the matron.

"He has been matching couples," the rabbi answered.

"That isn't so difficult," said the woman. "I can do as well."

"You may think it is simple," said Rabbi Yosei, "but it is as difficult as the splitting of the Red Sea."

The matron then took 1,000 male slaves and 1,000 female slaves, separated them into couples and joined them in matrimony. After some descended upon her, wounded and demanding the marriages be annulled, she agreed to the rabbi's point.

In the time of the Talmud, the rabbis who conducted the yeshivot recommended the young men to families with eligible daughters. In the 13th and 14th centuries matchmaking took on a significant role, as Jews were spread out in many areas.

According to an article on the Aish Hatorah website, the shadchan looked at "character, piety, intelligence and competence that would lend permanence to a marriage and encourage a high degree of moral stability in the community."

By the end of the Middle Ages, the shadchan was paid for his work, and one can find rabbinic response on methods, amounts paid and other details.

Shadchanim became peddlers of a different type, travelling from community to community and receiving higher payment when the bride and groom came from different distanced communities.

The Aish website also explains that the shadchan held an enormous responsibility matching qualities and "family pedigree and scholastic and economic achievements." The ideal was for a daughter to marry a Torah scholar.

With the later move of Jews to larger cities and the changing roles of young singles, the role of the shadchan changed.

Today matchmaking, or an arranged date, is accepted practice among Orthodox Jews as the best way to find a marriage partner. This occurs when the people involved feel they are old and serious enough to think about marriage.

Chabad says that while we are single we are only half a soul. By uniting someone with their other half, you have made them a couple.

In recent years, there have been books published on the subject including The Survival Guide to Shidduchim by Shari Stein and Shidduch Secrets by Leah Jacobs.

Searching on Google for "Jewish matchmaking" brings up a multitude of dating sites. PerfectMatch, JDate, JewishCafe, Matchmaker, Jewish FriendFinder, Mit Mazel, SawYouAtSinai, Beshert, Shoshanna's Matchmaking Service and JMatch, are just some of the many out there to help Jews meet their match.

Marriage flourishes with cultural enrichment

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements co-ordinator

On a recent visit to her grandparents' condo in Cote St. Luc, Zoë Mintz, a cool 22-year-old Concordia University student, listens intently as her Bubbie Edith Barr relates how women in the 1950s invariably married in their early 20s.

"I have always found my grandparents' stories to be a true testament to the struggles of their time, and deeply romantic because of it," Mintz said.

Born and educated in Bogota, Colombia, Edith (Vainberg) Barr "felt like an old maid at 21" because she was still single. Most of her contemporaries were married and the remaining Jewish bachelors had been childhood buddies of her brother. Hence, there was no one new to meet.

Determined to chart her course, Edith secured a six-month visa, bade her widowed mother and older siblings adieu and boarded a flight to visit relatives in North America. "The Vainberg family was originally from Romania and we conversed in fluent Yiddish at home, but my schooling was in Spanish and I lacked English," Edith says, alluding to one of many challenges that lay ahead.

Edith and Norman Barr celebrate Norman's 80th birthday in 2009.

The Flomen family in Montreal welcomed their niece, and their accountant fixed her up with a friend named Norman Barr. Born here in 1929, Norman's first language was English. "My mother was born in Canada and my father was a baby when his family immigrated," Norman relates. "So my brothers and I were brought up speaking English at home and school and on the street." Fortunately, Norman had picked up some Yiddish from other relatives.

Edith will never forget their first date. "Norman took me to see Edith Piaf at the Bellevue Casino and we ordered mixed drinks," she recalls, adding she noticed Norman saving the plastic swizzle sticks from their drinks. When queried about it, Norman explained he was a widower with a 3-1/2-year-old daughter, Reesa, and he wanted to bring her the decorative sticks. Norman had been married to Esther (Baizer) for 19 months when she died. The couple's daughter, Reesa, was only seven months old. Norman and Reesa lived with his in-laws, Sarah and Sam Baizer. They hired a nurse for Reesa.

"Nobody had told me he was a widower with a child and I was totally unprepared for this revelation," Edith recalls. When Norman phoned a few days later, she refused to see him. However, one night her relatives were all going to a wedding and her cousin convinced her it was better to accept Norman's invitation than to stay home alone. Fortunately, she listened, and Norman took her to see Louis Armstrong.

From Bogota with love

"We had a great time and I enjoyed his company," Edith says. "I liked his sense of humour, acts of kindness and generosity. By that time, I had fallen for him and was heartsick at having to leave for a pre-planned trip to visit my aunt and uncle in Winnipeg."

The perfect gentleman, Norman dropped Edith off at the airport but didn't promise any future encounters. "I remember him saying, 'It was a pleasure to spend time with you,' and he presented me with a bottle of Shalimar perfume and a silver lighter from Birks."

One night while Edith was having dinner with her relatives in Winnipeg, Norman phoned from Montreal. He said he would visit her in Winnipeg. Edith's aunt perceived Norman's intentions, purchased a bottle of champagne and chilled it in anticipation of the big question. "Norman stayed at a hotel and my relatives lent him their car. Every night, when I returned, they'd ask, 'So, what's new?'"

Sure enough on his last night in town, Norman proposed and Edith reported the good news. The Winnipeg relatives popped open the champagne and wished the couple mazel tov.

Norman's parents Rose and Max Barr booked the wedding at Montreal's Young Israel Synagogue, Nov. 15, 1958. The Baizers were equally elated and generous. "The Baizers were fine people and we had a wonderful relationship," Edith says.

For Edith, it was a big step. In Colombia, even people of modest means had maids, and domesticity was new for her. In addition, she had never experienced Montreal winters and didn't own any winter garments or gear. Because of immigration laws, the couple had to marry in Canada and her immediate family wasn't present. She also worried about her family's reaction to the marriage.

Fortunately, most of Edith's fears were unfounded. Everyone adored Norman. And Edith adapted to her Canadian lifestyle.

Reesa proved a catalyst in refining Edith's English. "Every day, when Reesa returned home from nursery school, I'd sit down with her and together we'd read her storybooks. I watched television, listened to the radio and kept up with newspapers and the Reader's Digest."

A month before the couple's first anniversary, Rochelle was born, followed by Monika in 1963. Today, Edith and Norman are the proud grandparents of Rochelle's children, Zoë and Stirling, 17, of Montreal; and Monika's children – the family lives in Israel – Ra'anan, 19, Sivan, 15, and Amir, 12.

The Barr daughters benefited from the Latin American connection. From 1966 to 1969, they lived in Colombia, where Norman was in the car parts business. Edith's brother David was a silent partner. Edith assigned a private tutor to give Norman Spanish language lessons every evening. The Barr children also learned to converse in Spanish and had an opportunity to experience Colombian culture and bond with Edith's relatives.

When the girls finished university and struck out on their own, empty nesters Edith and Norman travelled and pursued their respective interests. Edith enjoys opera and Norman favours fishing expeditions.

Beautiful mementoes of the Barrs' travels adorn their condo. Although they have derived lots of pleasure, they each endured troubles before and after they met. Edith was 17 when her father was killed by a car, while he was waiting to cross the street. Norman has undergone major surgeries and endured serious health issues. Edith is a breast cancer survivor. Recently, Reesa and Zoë participated in Montreal's Weekend to End Women's Cancers raising a team total of $43,700 in honor of Rochelle, who is currently battling breast cancer.

"We'll get through it," Norman says, motioning to Edith, who nods in agreement. "We've always been positive thinkers and we're not about to change." On Nov. 15, Edith and Norman will celebrate their 52nd anniversary.

"Chupah lady" wants to dance with angels

By PATRICIA GOLDBLATT
Special to The CJN

My daughter calls me "Chupah Lady," because every night after work, for several eye-pinching hours, that is what I am. When my son announced his engagement, I searched for an enduring and unique gift. My answer? A chupah!

I searched the Internet and discovered that the very first wedding was accompanied by a chupah. According to one legend, God made 10 chupahs for Adam and Eve, each fashioned of gold and precious gems.

I begin my search for a mentor. I discover Debra Messer, who owns a needlepoint shop. She has created chupahs for many synagogues but is willing to teach me the process. I have never tried needlepoint,but I am willing to learn the basketweave stitch, which is the basis for this project.

I search ancient manuscripts. I peruse posters and books, on the lookout for icons and traditional motifs. I am excited to create a design. Debra tells me I will need three panels that will be stitched together. When she tells me it will take 1,000 hours to complete, I scoff, thinking she exaggerates. I soon learn she does not.

The process of transferring the design to canvas is laborious and very detailed. I enlist my husband, who is precise and methodical. I find basketweaving to be very tricky. Debra has me practise and practise. I am frustrated that the backs of the practice canvases are a torrent of threads, scrambling into every direction.

Debra explains her grandmother had taught her the art of basketweaving. I imagine the loving looks that passed between them. My long-suffering husband is learning the continental stitch so that he can fill in the background.

Eventually, we settle down to an after supper routine of chupah duty. We pass needle-threaders back and forth. "Scissors," we call out as we exchange these, too. I think my husband has become as obsessed as I am with this project. It takes him an entire evening, 45 minutes for a single row, or three threads to do one line of background.

Although I liken this project to staying in the lines of a colouring book, I find that I am appreciating the joy of creativity. The call of colour, shape, form and texture satisfies me in a way I had forgotten exists. The chupah has reawakened something in me that I did not even know was lost.

The chupah progresses each evening and with it, I rediscover a part of myself that wants to dance with the angels. I look forward to displaying our work at the wedding. When it is completed, the chupah will be a family heirloom: a symbol of our love to be passed down from generation to generation.

Love at first sight

Ricki and Gil Gallen

By RICKI GALLEN
Special to The CJN

In July 1949, a girlfriend called me to arrange a blind double date with two fellows from New York who were taking a roadtrip to Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto.

At the appointed time, a beautiful white Oldsmobile convertible pulled into our driveway. Two young men introduced themselves as Stewart and Gil from Brooklyn.

My girlfriend was waiting in the front seat of the car. Gil tossed his car keys at Stewart, said "You can drive" and moved into the backseat with me.

As Gil told me long after that first meeting, he said that after a few minutes of conversation he had decided I was the one. (What could I have said?)

We went to a Chinese restaurant at Bay and Queen streets and then to Shea's Theatre to see a double feature.

On the way home (again in the backseat), Gil seemed to have more than the usual allotment of hands. Not knowing how to handle the situation without offending a guest to our city, I politely explained that we didn't do this in Canada.

Things progressed well enough that we arranged to drive up to Barrie the next day to visit The Mothers and Babes Rest Home, where I had worked the previous summer looking after disadvantaged families.

After Gil drove back home, I was inundated with phone calls. He flew to Toronto every other weekend on the noisy North Star planes of Trans-Canada Airlines. He'd arrive late on Saturday and leave early Monday morning. Once he brought a container of pistachio ice cream (in the fridge of the plane) because I had once expressed an interest in green ice cream.

In the old-fashioned way, Gil asked my dad for permission to marry me. We set the date for the following July. My new in-laws threw an engagement party for us, and while riding in a taxi from the airport, Gil handed me a box of chocolates. One of the candies was missing, replaced by a small box holding a gorgeous diamond ring.

Flying to Toronto every other week was taking its toll on Gil, financially and otherwise. We changed the wedding date to Feb. 2, 1950. Sixty years later, we are still celebrating.

Ricki and Gil Gallen have two married sons, Steven (Debbi) and Stan (Ida) and four grandchildren; Rob, Joanna, Lisa and Janice.

Canoe trip love story

By CORY GILLMAN
Special to The CJN

The top picture, was taken in Algonquin Park. Cory Gillman, 6, helps Kristin Thomas, 4, with her life jacket on their first canoe trip together. Twenty years after it was taken it was used as the couple's unique wedding invitation. In the bottom picture Cory and Kristin compare stomachs.

Kristin was four, I was six on our first canoe trip to Algonquin Park with siblings and dads. We kids wrepresented the next generation of trippers. Our parents enjoyed Algonquin trips together as students. The "Canoe Trip" as it came to be known, was an annual end-of-summer bash, with junk food and wild adventures. It was a shake-your-sillies-out kind of trip that helped us transition from summer freedom to the new school year, while giving us a taste of our parents' beloved wilderness. Though we six kids saw each other but once each year for a few days in Algonquin Park, those days added up to a lot of shared experiences. Inevitable outcomes of the fun, hard work, disappointments, stormy weather and unpredictable situations, were the growth of trust and friendships.

My interest in K, as she was known, eventually reached way beyond her canoeing prowess. By the 11th trip I decided to share those special feelings with her. Much to my delight and relief, even though we each had very cute siblings, she was just as smitten with me as I was with her. At parting time that year, our family was invited to her family's cottage to break up the long drive home. My father, obviously oblivious to my predicament and despite my protestations, politely but repeatedly refused. To say I was not happy was an understatement. I was 17 and desperately in love, so when we got home I phoned. Kristin was so logical, no doubt prompted by her mom who answered the phone before passing it on. She sadly reminded me that we live an hour apart with no easy access to transit and no driver's licenses. She also worried about the demise of the canoe trip if our relationship didn't work out.

I reluctantly acquiesced but felt defeated and deflated. After hanging up all I could do was cry. I finally enlightened my father who heard my sobbing. He was sympathetic and tried to talk but became overwhelmed in his empathy and we simply hugged and wept together. With impeccable timing, my mother walked in, took one look at her weeping son and husband and instantly joined in without even knowing why. If the word "weird" had a cousin who was much bigger and way more awkward, that word would describe our relationship during the next three trips. We avoided speaking about anything non-canoe-trip related, even tried not to paddle together, choosing instead to stay in our safe family groups.

But unrequited love doesn't just fade because you will it to. It lingers, grows even, so after an entire year of university behind me, I decided to take another shot and ask her out, even though I was now in Thunder Bay and she was in Halifax. She said yes without hesitation and admitted that she'd been waiting for me to ask. What a difference three years makes.

On the final night of our 20th family canoe trip, the group presented meaningful gifts to each other around the campfire in honor of continuing friendships and annual sojourns. Swiss army knives, portaging paraphernalia and other appropriate trip items were offered. Each of us took turns relaying what the relationship has meant.

I addressed all the members and then turned deliberately and specifically to Kristin, handed her the very special shiny gift that I had literally kept close to the chest throughout the trip, and asked her to marry me. I think she said yes again because I heard a lot of cheering…and the rest, as they say, is history.

K and I recently celebrated our sixth wedding anniversary and are anxiously awaiting the pending birth of our first child. We hope and expect to continue the tradition and to teach this child what we learned along the way…everything you need to know about relationships, you'll learn on a canoe trip.

Gifts from grandma's day reminders of way we were

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements co-ordinator

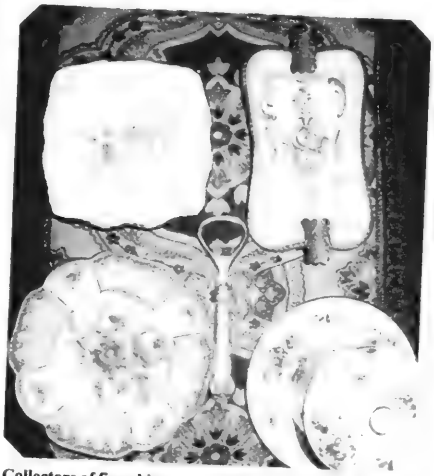
For many of us, when we're invited to prenuptial parties, showers or wedding receptions, one of our first thoughts is of what gift to bring or send. While this act of giving has long been traditional, many of the presents considered popular a generation ago are regarded as relics in 2010.

Until recently, ashtrays, cigarette trays, silver engraved match box containers, table lighters and decorative soda bottle openers served as popular gifts for prenuptials and wedding receptions.

True, people still smoke and drink soda, but unlike in prior decades, lighting up is discouraged in private homes and in venues such as synagogues, hotels and halls. Conversely, until the end of the 20th century, nonsmokers felt compelled to respect smokers' rights. Dignitaries, stage stars and media personalities were invariably photographed smoking. For years, celebrated American broadcaster Edward R. Murrow smoked his way through his highly rated nationally televised interviews.

How things have changed! Now, everyone knows that smoking is a health hazard and secondhand smoke is equally harmful.

Ashtrays, cigarette holders and lighters therefore lack the cachet of bygone years. A high proportion of North American newlyweds have no use for these decorative items. For earlier generations, these items were put to good use and added to the décor. Even non-smokers made it their business to have ashtrays visibly placed for guests. After dinner, hosts invited their guests to the parlour or den to smoke. Today, guests are politely ushered outdoors to smoke.



Collectors of fine china and decorative pieces still admire these beautifully crafted items that are reminders of an earlier era. [Elaine Cohen photo]

With regard to wedding gifts, this modern health-conscious trend may rule out a whole category of gifts that once suited the budgets of young guests invited to a bridal shower or to join the sweet table and dancing after the wedding dinner. The same goes for acquaintances or distant relatives not invited to the wedding, but eager to send a modest keepsake.

The bottle opener is another item that has lost its former stature. In fact, most of the traditional sterling or Sheffield silver cutlery sets included bottle openers. Brides and grooms usually received one or two as gifts. The pretty patterns on the handles matched or complemented the other pieces in the set. People used openers to pry caps off soft drink bottles. Once technology improved, the openers lay dormant in flatware chests.

However, collectors still value their beautifully crafted ashtrays, cigarette holders, lighters and bottle openers, and many stunning pieces have been handed down to younger generations. Now, these handsome ashtrays have a dual use as collectibles and pretty pin or trinket dishes.

Fortunately, numerous other traditional items are still in vogue. Picture frames are available at most gift boutiques, and whether they grace a wall, cabinet or end table, the frames enhance the decor. The photographs or artwork are conversation pieces and give people pleasure. Picture frames are crafted in silver, pewter, gold, ceramic and numerous other materials. The shapes, sizes and designs vary and so do the prices, making them affordable for any budget.

Vases, coasters, bar accessories, barbecue utensils, napkin rings and holders, corkscrews, bonbon dishes, placemats, salt and pepper shakers, butter dishes, sugar and creamer sets, salad bowls and servers, cake forks, pie knives, challah trays and covers, photo albums, fruit bowls, condiment dishes, candles and candlesticks, schnapps glasses, mezuzot and Judaica are just a sampling of treasured items that are available in gift shops and boutiques. Since prices vary according to the quality of merchandise, intricacy of design and craftsmanship, consumers can be as frugal or generous as their pocketbooks will allow.

Shower parties "shower" the bride with gifts

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

Once the engagement ring is on her finger, a bride's thoughts may quickly turn to parties and special events organized in her honour. Thus the bridal shower has become an innate part of the wedding plans and proceedings.

The tradition originated in the 1800s in the Netherlands and may correspond to the ancient custom of the bride's dowry or trousseau, ensuring that the young couple would have everything they needed to set up their home. A trousseau or hope chest was usually started at the moment of a daughter's birth, and as she grew to womanhood, her parents would set aside items she would need in her own home.

Showers for brides have become a common component of the excitement and frivolity before the actual wedding. The earliest use of this expression may be found in the Grand Rapids Michigan Evening Press of June 4, 1904: "The shower parties... may derive from the custom in Victorian times for the presents to be put inside a parasol, which when opened would "shower" the bride-to-be with gifts."

There are many ideas to make bridal showers original and fun. For example, at one event, guests were invited to share their favourite recipes with the young bride and brought gifts associated with these recipes, such as how to make shortbread cookies along with a cookie sheet and all the ingredients. An idea for another bride was "rooms." On each guest's invitation the name of a different room in the home is printed for which the guest could buy a gift. If your invitation reads the bathroom, your gift could be towels, a shower curtain, bath mats or soap dishes, or perhaps a basket filled with the bride's favourite shampoo, bath salts and lotions. If the invitation indicates you have the bedroom, the gifts could be linens, pillows or lamps; and for the dining room, glasses, dishes, place mats, or table cloths.

As the mother of the bride, Franceen Besner Goffman wanted to give her daughter something unique and special for her bridal shower. Goffman remembered the saying "something old, something new, something borrowed, something blue," and decided to make her gift based on this quote.

"Something old was my sterling cutlery, and something new was a diamond watch," she explains.

"Something borrowed was a gold wedding band, passed down from my maternal grandmother," continues Goffman who is the keeper of this wedding band that has been worn by three generations of brides at their marriage ceremonies: her grandmother, her mother, her sister and herself.

"The next to wear the ring were my nieces and my daughter," says Goffman, who hopes the tradition will continue down the line from generation to generation.

The last gift to complete the saying was more whimsical: a blue garter along with a cone shaped cellophane bag filled with every shade of blue jelly beans Goffman could find. The explanation for the gifts was in the wrapping. Goffman cut out heart shapes that she then attached to wires and wrote the words "old, new, borrowed, blue" on them, and then wrapped these around each respective gift.

The ritual of the bridal shower was originally to indoctrinate the young bride into her new traditional role as a homemaker: baking, cooking, and cleaning. However, with the changing roles of society today, historian Elisabeth Pleck notes that the thought behind the bridal shower is "more of an homage to the mothers and grandmothers than a reflection of how the bride-to-be will actually behave in the marriage."

Infinity wows celebrants with simchahs in Israel

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements Co-ordinator

Among the greatest joys in life are celebrating a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah, reunion or special event with family and friends. Although many magnificent global venues exist, few can compete with Israel.

Whether watching the sunrise atop Masada, praying at the Western Wall, exploring an ancient fortress, dining and dancing at an elegant hotel or combing the sandy beaches of Tel Aviv, Israel sparkles as a source of enlightenment and entertainment. Jews of all ages benefit from the memorable spiritual experience.

To make the most of the expedition and festivities, clients seek savvy event planners. The planner must have knowledge of the habitat, languages, religious practices, places of worship, historic sites, hotel and hospitality industry, laws, licences and much more. Moreover, the planner must be creative, reliable and efficient.

Blessed with talent and business acumen, Tamar Yarosky secured her niche as co-partner of Infinity Events, a Dankner Productions company in Israel. A native Montrealer, Yarosky was 12 when her family made aliyah. She attended high school, served in the army, received a master's degree in communication and a law degree in Israel and later returned to Montreal for several years. Subsequently, Yarosky, her Israeli husband, Oded Tal, and their two children left here to settle in their beloved Ramat Hasharon. Two years ago, Yarosky teamed up with corporate events planner and marketing guru Amir Dankner.

"Amir [who is Israeli] and my husband have been friends since childhood," Yarosky said. "Amir has been in the business for 15 years and is highly regarded for planning significant global corporate events. Throughout the years, he would constantly receive requests to arrange his clients' private simchahs. Fortunately, through our partnership, now we can fill that need."

Infinity Events, a Dankner Productions company, proved the perfect niche for Yarosky and Dankner. Dankner has served high-profile clients in Israel such as Intel, IBM, Coca-Cola, HP and Texas Instruments, and produced events in Thailand, India, Cyprus, Spain and other countries. For example, last summer, Dankner staged an event for 40,000 in Romania.

Yarosky's area of concentration is the private sector. She excels in planning awesome events in Israel for out-of-towners as well as Israelis. Last winter, the principals from Infinity Events spent a week in Israel with a family from Mexico City planning a bar mitzvah. The family returned home without finalizing the venue and plans. However, they felt comfortable with Yarosky and Dankner and entrusted Infinity Events with arrangements.

Besides the host's guests from Mexico, they received 30 others from elsewhere. Everyone was delighted with Infinity Events' arrangements.

"The Mexican entourage flew to Israel and toured for 10 days," Yarosky said in an interview when she was in Montreal recently. "They chose to hold the bar mitzvah ceremony at Davidson Center in Jerusalem in the late afternoon. Guests were then bused to the American Colony boutique hotel for cocktails followed by dinner. Although the hotel hosts many events on its spectacular property, it is not a typical venue for bar mitzvahs. That's where we look outside of the box. We always choose venues and amenities that reflect our clients' vision. This family wanted something elegant but not over the top. The American Colony Hotel unites people from different cultures. The hotel has long been host to dignitaries and celebrities, who call it their home away from home."

After the ceremony, the party headed for cocktails on the hotel's Pasha Terrace. Infinity Events also surprised the guests with a belly dancer. The celebrations continued the next day with visits to Masada and the Kfar Hanokdim Bedouin Village. Camels awaited anyone who wanted to go for a ride. After dinner, everyone joined in a drumming circle.

This group appreciated the Middle Eastern component, but Yarosky said every client is different, and whether it's a wedding or family reunion, everything must be tailored to the client's budget and tastes.

Yarosky knows the Israeli psyche and way of doing things, and has empathy for visitors from outside the country. Infinity clients benefit from her in-depth knowledge of both worlds.

"We work with trusted vendors and oversee everything from catering to candles. Infinity books hotels, tours, buses, cars and, of course, we find a rabbi suitable to each family for a wedding or bar mitzvah. Planning a simchah that takes place thousands of miles from home is a tricky task. To do the legwork, it's important to be aware of laws and customs, and insist on being treated right.

"I retain close ties with family and friends in Canada and I'm able to identify with the North American mindset," Yarosky said. "We conceptualize a vision and attend to details. Thanks to technology, it's easy to send photos, videos and communicate."

Out-of-towners can opt for healthy meals

By ELAINE COHEN
Supplements co-ordinator

When you travel out-of-town to attend a simchah, it's tempting to stray from your usual diet regimen. Between the aroma of steaming delectables and the sight of luscious-looking treats, it's easy to over-indulge in snacks and fattening meals.

And whether it's Shabbat dinner at a relative's home, a pre-nuptial gala, a bar mitzvah party or a wedding reception, the refreshments are often laden with calories, but it's hard to refuse second helpings. Fortunately, though, in big cities like Montreal and Toronto, there are many strictly kosher, healthy choices.

If the simchah is held on a long holiday weekend – or even if it's not – guests may take advantage of an extra day or two to visit sites in the city where the celebration takes place. Then, whether they are staying in a hotel with a kitchenette or restaurant, or at someone's home, they will find different foods available. Aware of this, the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Canada and Canada's Food Guide offer wise choices and sensible tips that can be applied when on the road.

When at the simchah, it's often difficult to make the right selection; however, if you're out on the town, eating in your hotel or ordering in, it's possible to make healthy choices.

At a coffee shop or breakfast stop, opt for a low-fat, whole grain muffin instead of a Danish or doughnuts. Bagel-lovers can still have their bagel. But instead of a bagel loaded with cream cheese, go for a whole grain bagel with a small amount of light cream cheese, peanut butter or lower-fat cheese. Poached eggs or plain omelettes with unbuttered whole grain toast are tasty and healthy, so shun fried eggs and omelets with hash browns. Opt for coffee or tea with milk instead of cream.

Even the deli or sandwich counter need not be threatening. Choose a whole grain bread or bun, rather than white bread or a rich croissant. Specify lean chicken, turkey or roast beef and nix higher fat options such as salami or smoked meat. Salads may be healthy, but forgo rich dressings. For example, opt for green salad, fruit salad or bean salad instead of Caesar, potato or macaroni salad. Before reaching for a glass of fruit juice or milk, check to see if the beverage is unsweetened and the milk is low-fat.

Whether you step out for kosher pizza or have it delivered to your hotel door, check the menu. Do you have a choice of whole wheat or another type of whole grain crust? If so, it's preferable to the white crust. In addition, a vegetarian pizza is healthier than pizza with the works.

People with a yen for Asian food can order steamed dumplings grilled, steamed or stir-fried veggies instead of deep-fried items.

At a chicken eatery, pick barbecued, baked, grilled or stir-fried chicken with the skin removed.

At a burger place, choose plain or child-sized hamburgers that are grilled and placed on whole grain buns.

Italian food aficionados should opt for broiled, baked, grilled or poached fish, chicken or veal. As for pasta, it's preferable to choose pasta with vegetables in tomato sauce sprinkled with Parmesan cheese rather than pasta baked in a rich, fattening sauce. Fresh fruit is healthy, naturally sweet and delicious – and it will result in fewer guilt trips than decadent desserts.

Dietitians note that a steady diet of fast foods may result in your getting too little fibre and fewer vitamins A, C, D and folic acid than advisable. Fortunately, many eateries now include lighter and lower-fat options directly on their menus.

How does a typical fast food meal add up? The average adult needs about 2,000 calories, no more than 65 g of fat and no more than 2,400 mg of sodium daily. Seek choices with fewer calories, fat and sodium.

Watch for portion sizes and don't feel obligated to clean the plate. Enormous portions are common and there is no harm in leaving a little over or asking for someone to serve less food.

Balance out the meal. Meals eaten away from home may be low in vegetables, fruit and dairy products. Nutritionists offer these suggestions. Think about food choices for the entire day. If eating out for one meal, then plan to eat plenty of whole grains, vegetables, fruit and lower-fat dairy products the rest of the day. Stay away from soft drinks. Drink water instead of colas or other sugary beverages.

'Status quo not an option,' Livni says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel should pursue peace talks with the Palestinian Authority (PA) so that its future as a Jewish democratic state can be assured, Israeli Opposition leader Tzipi Livni said in Toronto last week.

"This process must be continued," declared Livni, who as deputy prime minister and foreign minister in Israel's previous government, led talks with the Palestinian side for nine months until they collapsed after Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip in January 2009.

"The status quo is not an option," she added in an implicit critique of Israel's current government, led by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

A peaceful resolution of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians is in Israel's national self-interest, said Livni, the head of the centrist Kadima party and a member of Netanyahu's governing Likud party until a few years ago.

Only peace can ensure that Israel will remain Jewish as well as democratic, she said, addressing a large audience at a United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto function at the Events on the Park.

Kadima party leader Tzipi Livni

Livni, who left the Likud party in 2005 along with her boss, former prime minister Ariel Sharon, pledged to give Netanyahu political support if he takes the "right steps" toward peace.

"Time is of the essence," she noted. "We have to make tough decisions."

On a speaking tour in the United States prior to her visit to Toronto, Livni urged Netanyahu to make "the necessary decisions" required to keep talks with the Palestinians going, and warned that a "blow up" of negotiations would have grave consequences for Israel.

The PA suspended its participation in the talks, pending an Arab League summit in Libya on Oct. 8, after Netanyahu refused to extend the 10-month partial moratorium on settlement construction in the West Bank, claimed by Israel and the Palestinians.

The News in Brief

Canada

Graffiti Found

HALIFAX — Graffiti targeting Jews and blacks were found carved into a wooden play structure in a Halifax-area park on Sept. 30. The playground in suburban Hammonds Plains had been hit with racist graffiti earlier the same week, and the Sept. 30 find was the fifth such incident in the area in 10 days, the Halifax Chronicle Herald reported. Police said last week it's too early to tell if the graffiti is the work of bored kids or something more serious.

Premier Visits Israel

WINNIPEG — Manitoba NDP Premier Greg Selinger is in Israel this week on a mission led by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg. Selinger is being accompanied by Water Stewardship Minister Christine Melnick and Innovation, Energy and Mines Minister Dave Chomiak. Before leaving, Selinger said he plans to sign partnership agreements in agriculture and water quality research, as well as examine Israel's work in developing electric vehicles.

Wagner Cancels Trip

JERUSALEM — Composer Richard Wagner's great-granddaughter cancelled a visit to Israel after the leaked trip prompted criticism over her anti-Semitic ancestor. Katharina Wagner was scheduled to visit Israel this week to formally invite the Israel Chamber Orchestra to open next summer's Wagner Festival in Bayreuth, Germany. Her visit, which had been kept secret for a year, was leaked to the Israeli media to mixed reactions in Israel and abroad. Wagner's works are generally not performed in Israel, where he is reviled as a vocal anti-Semite whose work was adored by Adolf Hitler. Wagner subsequently retracted the orchestra's invitation to play at the festival. It will perform in the town, but not at the festival itself.

Ex-Anchor Apologizes

NEW YORK — Fired CNN anchor Rick Sanchez apologized to comedian Jon Stewart for calling him a bigot and implying that Jews control the media. In an Oct. 6 statement, Sanchez said he called the star of Comedy Central's and CTV's The Daily Show and that the two had a "very good" conversation. "As Jon was kind enough to note in his show [Oct. 4], I am very much opposed to hate and intolerance, in any form, and I have frequently spoken out against prejudice. Despite what my tired and mangled words may have implied, they were never intended to suggest any sort of narrow-mindedness and should never have been made," Sanchez said. During a freewheeling exchange with Latino radio host Pete Dominick, Sanchez, a native of Cuba, alleged that Stewart singled him out for ridicule because of white bigotry, and he implied that CNN and other networks were run by "people like Stewart."

Art Sale Record

HONG KONG — The sale of an oil painting by Jewish artist Marc Chagall set an Asian record for western art. The 1969 painting Bestiaire et Musique was auctioned Oct. 4 in Hong Kong to an unidentified Asian buyer for $4.18 million (US). Modern western art typically sells for more in Europe and the United States than in Asia.

Paper Backs Off Gay Nuptials Ad Apology

NEW YORK — After expressing regret for printing a gay wedding announcement, the New Jersey Jewish Standard says it now regrets the hasty apology.

The Jewish weekly's Sept. 24 publication of a gay couple's announcement sparked outrage among some local Orthodox rabbis, prompting the Teaneck-based paper to apologize a week later and pledge not to run another such item in the future. But after a backlash online and from other community members for the hasty backtracking on the gay issue, the Jewish Standard reversed course again.

"We ran the wedding announcement because we felt, as a community newspaper, that it was our job to serve the entire community – something we have been doing for 80 years," publisher James Janoff said in a statement in last week's paper. "We did not expect the heated response we got, and – in truth – we believe now that we may have acted too quickly in issuing the followup statement, responding only to one segment of the community."

Janoff said the paper is meeting with other local rabbis and community leaders and that it would publish many of the letters prompted by the controversy. He didn't say definitively whether the paper would publish gay wedding announcements in the future.

Mayoral candidates address Jewish concerns

With less than two weeks to go before election day on Oct. 25, The CJN presents it's coverage of the four main mayoral candidates, all of whom have taken time over the course of the campaign to address issues of concern to the city's Jewish community.

The following is derived from recent interviews, as well as debates organized by Jewish groups, namely an Aug. 19 event held by the Association of Jewish Seniors and the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, and an Oct. 5 debate convened by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Centre for Holocaust Studies (FSWC).

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF and RITA POLIAKOV
Staff Reporter

The four remaining front-running Toronto mayoral candidates may have major policy differences in their platforms, but they all share the belief that the Jewish community and Israel should not be demonized by any groups in publicly funded events.

Speaking about last July's gay Pride parade, in which the group Queers Against Israeli Apartheid (QuAIA) was allowed to participate – despite protests from the Jewish community and initial assurances by Pride organizers that it would nota be allowed to take part – all the candidates told The CJN they would not allow a repeat of the event.

"Hate has no place at Pride, and hate has no place in any event that the public is asked to subsidize," Rocco Rossi said. "We need to tighten up the [city's non-discrimination policy] language, and as mayor, I will not financially support any [hate] group at any event with public dollars. Next year, no funding if [QuAIA] is there."

George Smitherman took a more nuanced stance on this issue, saying that despite QuAIA's presence in the parade this past summer, "the Jewish community needs to know there is a plurality of people in the [gay] community who recognize Israel is advanced with respect to rights for the LGBT community. I will continue to oppose QuAIA."

The former provincial health minister said that as a gay man, he understands what it means to be persecuted and has empathy for the Jewish community as a result.

If elected, Rob Ford said he will refuse to fund Pride next year if QuAIA is allowed to march again.

"I think it's straightforward. Zero tolerance," the Etobicoke councillor said. "I'm not going to give them a dime. We can't stop [QuAIA] from marching, but we can stop writing that cheque."

Current Deputy Mayor Joe Pantalone said that if elected, he would sit down with the Pride committee to discuss the issue.

"What I want to do after the election is get together, sit down with the members of Pride Toronto and also members of whatever community is concerned about it, particularly the Jewish community, and figure out what it is we need to do," he said in a recent phone interview.

Pantalone added that Pride Toronto must decide whether or not they want to politicize an event that celebrates gay rights.

"What's the purpose [of the parade]? A political dialogue? A celebration? And if this debate needs to be undertaken, what is the proper forum for this?" he said, adding that, next year, grants will be given only after the actual parade.

"It's a balance we're trying to strike between people's rights and [discrimination]," Pantalone said at the FSWC debate. "Israel's right to exist is fundamental and shouldn't be put into question. Let's have the conversation."
